Visa students hit again

By PETER ARUVALD

Visa students have been hassled again this year with another piece of red tape; they are required to fill out a Declaration of Fee Assessment Status form so the University can correctly assess who should be paying higher fees.

The Declaration of Fee Assessment Status form was sent along with registration material to all U of T students. In view of an already overloaded administrative process, questions have been raised as to whether other, possibly less costly, alternatives were considered. If so, why was the completion of a declaration chosen as the method of assessment?

The declaration, which was drafted by the Ministry of Procedures and approved by the Council of Academic Records, was considered the most accurate method of assessing higher fees. Lippard stressed the point that since the university has a legal responsibility to supply MCU with the most accurate information possible, the mandatory completion of the form by all students was the only feasible means by which to fulfill this responsibility.

Mark Lippard, Manager of Student Record Services, reports that other alternatives were considered, but were found to be inadequate. One possibility, proposed by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities (MCU) in co-operation with the Council of Ontario Universities (COU), was to check students' social insurance numbers, since all recently allotted numbers are coded as to the individual's status in Canada. Although Ryerson has apparently adopted this system, the idea was withdrawn by the ministry, since many student visa holders already have social insurance numbers which are not coded.

Another proposal was to compile lists of student visa holders, through the computer, and then forward these lists to the different faculties. This method too, however, was deemed inadequate.

Student Council (SAC) president John Tuzyk and Brian O'Riordan, University Government Commissioner, expressed concern over the cost of the assessment procedure. As to the expense of all the extra paperwork and man-hours required by this particular method, Lippard replied that at this point the cost would be impossible to estimate, but that it "would not be low."

Others simply considered it a nuisance. Furthermore, no doubt due to the strong wording of the declaration, a major concern was the possible consequences of making a mistake on the form. Lippard stated that all completed declarations are cross-checked with student information forms, and if the student is a visa holder, then further checked with his records. If an inadvertent error is made by the student, he said, then it should be no hassle to rectify it, although a definite procedure for submitting of revised forms has yet to be decided upon.

Both O'Riordan and Tuzyk report that student feedback over the forms has been varied. Some were disturbed over the possible infringement of civil liberties, while O'Riordan also mentioned that the question of the declaration might be raised at a future SAC meeting in order to get some answers from the administration, in particular about the cost.

First SAC meeting tonite Simcoe Hall

The first Student Council (SAC) Board of Directors meeting for the school year will take place tonight at 8 p.m. in the Governing Council Chamber, Simcoe Hall.

The meeting will feature a multi-media presentation of the Campus as Campus Centre project, prepared by SAC Vice-President Dave Jones and SAC Architecture Director Steve King. The presentation outlines the underlying concepts of the project as well as the history of the attempts by SAC to implement it.

As well, the board plans to discuss its strategy with respect to upcoming changes in student aid. The Ontario Student Aid Program (OSAP) is in the process of being revised by the Ontario government.

The Board will also consider guidelines for the Project Aid grant program, student directory policy and review the upcoming schedule of Orientation events.

Join the Varsity and see the world.

At The Varsity we spend most of our time doing two things: watching the world and reporting about it. The problem is that the world is very large and our staff is very small. Hence there are parts of the globe which to our great regret we have to ignore.

We could say that we need you but in fact it would be more accurate to say you need us. We want to put out a good paper but the paper is literally as good as the people who write it. Therefore if you want to like what you read you have to help write it. If you don't like the paper it's all the more reason to become a staffer.

However, don't join The Varsity out of duty. Join us because The Varsity is a good place to meet people, because contributing to the paper is an intensely satisfying experience and because there is no other place on campus where you can have conversations as long as those that go on at The Varsity.

Join The Varsity and see the world. Then write about it or take a picture of it. Whatever you do you'll be glad to have done it.

"Where is the passion for Canada by the young people who just a short time ago found it so necessary to demonstrate on behalf of other people in other lands?"

Ontario Housing Minister,
John Rhodes.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsworld Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity. An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

NATIONAL UNITY... WITH WHOM AND FOR WHAT

Reactionaries are never as nauseating as when they try to act hip.

Ontario Housing Minister John Rhodes will therefore excuse us if after reading about his national unity speech in Port Carling on Monday we retire to the bathroom. There he was, on the front page of the Star — the journalistic equivalent of the Lawrence Welk show — telling us "young people" to "start marching for our nation."

"Where is the passion for Canada by the young people who just a short time ago found it necessary to demonstrate on behalf of other people in other lands?" he asked. If we have marched for Vietnam and "Spanish republicanism", argued the Honourable Minister to the delight of his sophisticated audience, it is only fair that we now march for our own Canada.

In saying this, Rhodes was almost certainly not referring to the Young Progressive Conservatives gathered in front of him. They, you can be sure, never marched for either Vietnam or "Spanish republicanism". More likely, if marching for anything was ever considered suitable for proper young people, they would have marched to support American bombing and wish long life to General Franco.

But then if the minister was not addressing himself to his admirers who was his audience? Surely not the "self-styled" radicals (as the Star would call them) who actually denounced American barbarism in Vietnam and fascism in Spain? For let's face it: if you supported any of those causes you wouldn't be the kind to pay any attention to the prefabricated sentimentality of someone like Rhodes.

So perhaps the minister was just talking nonsense — profound nonsense. And indeed the closer we look at it the more this appears to be the case.

We are told that we should demand unity in Canada. Unity with whom? And for what purpose?

This country that Rhodes and his friends are so bent on uniting is structured such that the highest paid 20 percent of the population claim 42.5 percent of the total income while the poorest 20 percent claim only 4 percent. The distribution of power is even worse, since the vast majority of people have no say over their everyday lives, apart from determining which of several bosses they are to be governed by.

The only unity that makes any sense under these conditions is unity between those at the bottom against those at the top. By contrast, what Rhodes, Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and the rest are pushing is not unity but amnesia: Let's forget that we have nothing in common with those who run the country, let's forget that their interests are in the end diametrically opposed to ours, let's forget all this, hug each other and march forward.

John Rhodes himself seems quite good at forgetting. "The opportunities for young Canadians have never been greater," he said at the meeting, "nor have the challenges been more exciting." I suppose there is some truth to that. These are exciting times we live in, one might even say harrowing. With both summer and full-time jobs slowly becoming extinct and with education being threatened by more cutbacks, faced with crowded classrooms and impersonal teaching methods, we are certainly a lucky bunch. Whether we like it or not we have to live dangerously. Isn't that exciting?

Our suggestion to Rhodes: lead the march and head for Lake Ontario.

Insult to the rest of world?

By DOUG SMITH

MAN-CUP — Traditionally, immigrants to Canada have been given the hardest work, the worst farmland, the lowest pay and the poorest of living conditions. In keeping with this xenophobic tradition, through which the country has been developed on the backs of people with funny last names, comes the new federal immigration bill.

The bill, which was passed by the House of Commons in July, gives wide-ranging powers to officials of the department of immigration to decide who will be admitted to Canada and who will be deported. The legislation overturns many judicial concepts such as the right to a hearing, the assumption of innocence until guilt is proven and introduces a form of guilt by association.

The bill has drawn considerable criticism for increasing the grounds for deportation and refusal of admission. The government has justified these regulations as being necessary for continued national security.

However, NDP MP Andrew Brewin says the government has not provided any evidence that immigrants have constituted a major threat to national security. Brewin says he thinks the government's actions were highly exaggerated and added that deportation should only be used in the rarest of cases. He pointed to the fact that under special anti-terrorist legislation that was passed for the Olympic games, only two people, to his knowledge, had been arrested.

The legislation has been termed "racist, discriminatory and unworthy of a civilized country" by an advisory committee to the Quebec immigration department.

An immigrant can now be refused admission to Canada if it is thought that he or she is not a genuine immigrant. Distinctions between counterfeit and genuine immigrants are not included in the bill, and will be left to the discretion of the department of immigration.

Also included in the prohibited class are those people for whom there are reasonable grounds to believe they will engage in acts of espionage or subversion against democratic governments. This is coupled with a ban on people likely to engage in, or instigate, the subversion by force of any government in the world.

This legislation could bar people who had opposed the Chilean junta or the regime of Idi Amin. If the legislation had been in effect in the 1930s, it would have allowed the deportation of refugees from Nazi Germany, because many of them were likely to advocate the destruction of the German government.

The legislation is frightening not only in the way it appears to cut out many political refugees but in the way decisions are reached on the basis of mere speculation rather than any hard proof. A person merely needs to be associated with such a disapproved group to be deported. Association is another term that is being left to interpretation by the authorities.

A person can be deported if he or she falls into any of the above described prohibited categories. It will be possible for the minister of immigration of the solicitor-general to file a security certificate that can be considered grounds for deportation. The certificate is deemed to be proof of the charges stated in the certificate. This type of catch-22 will allow the government to deport anyone without the benefit of an appeal.

During the 1960s, immigration officers collaborated with the RCMP to illegally deport draft-dodgers back to the United States.

Many of the rights which a Canadian citizen takes for granted will be denied to immigrants by the new bill. Immigration officers will now have the right to search, detain and arrest any immigrant without a warrant. This power is also extended to any Canadian peace officer.

The act abolishes the concept of domicile, through which an immigrant who lived in Canada for five years could only be deported for subversion, espionage or dealing in narcotics. These people will now be as susceptible to deportation as any other immigrant.

While a person can become a citizen after three years, there are many political refugees who prefer to retain their original citizenship in hopes of returning to their homeland. The new legislation almost forces them to take out citizenship to avoid deportation.

All non-citizens entering or leaving the country can be fingerprinted and photographed under the new legislation.

According to Khan Rahi of the IDEA Centre in Winnipeg, the new regulations regarding refugees are so restrictive that it will be almost impossible to qualify as a refugee.

Refugee status will be granted by a refugee advisory committee. This committee will review cases without having hearings in which the applicant can state their case. Even if refugees are certified by the committee, they must qualify on the point system that is used to judge other immigrants. The point system assesses age, education, employability and where the person is going. The new legislation also gives more points to the discretionary judgment of the immigration officer.

Opponents of the bill have suggested that immigrants who participate in a strike may be deported because their actions are not fostering the development of a strong and viable economy in the country.

During the 1919 Winnipeg general strike, special legislation was passed in an attempt to deport the leaders of the strike. They were not deported because of the force of public opinion at that time.

Brewin, the NDP immigration critic, says one of his major objections to the bill is that many of its provisions delegate the real law-making authority to the governor-in-council rather than to Parliament.

He says this will probably result in the cabinet following the advice of its bureaucrats. He adds that the real rules of the game will be made up in secret, with no input from the people of Canada.

Dissident speaks out

By SA'AD A. SAIDULL

"We demand that human rights be discussed without reservations. There is the need to establish a mass movement to apply pressure on each government to carry out the Helsinki Agreement and for governments to ensure that other governments do so.

Human rights are as important as the principle of detente. Detente will, in fact, be false if promises to guarantee human rights are not carried out. If it is not possible to fully discuss human rights as fully as possible then there is the need, as some trade unions have come to realize, for a parallel Belgrade Conference." Leonid Plyushch told a jam-packed crowd at the Faculty of Education Auditorium on Monday night.

Plyushch is a Ukrainian dissident who was recently allowed to leave the U.S.S.R. after a long period of persecution, because of his outspoken support for human rights, and is now living in Paris. Only about ten days ago the mathematician-cybernetics expert won a battle of votes (121-66) for the establishment of a permanent committee of the World Psychiatric Association to investigate the manipulation of political purposes in the world.

Plyushch's presence at the Honolulu convention of the association, Leningrad psychiatrist Marina Volkanskaya's white and black lists (of the Soviet political victims in mental institutions and of the psychiatrists who put them there), and Nobel Laureate Andrei Sakharov's signed appeal climaxed a successful six-year campaign to censure Soviet psychiatry in holding agitators for human rights, sometimes under inhuman conditions.

Olga Kuplowska, a representative of the Committee in Defense of Soviet Political Prisoners' Rights, which together with the Ukrainian Canadian Students' Union sponsored the lecture, began the proceedings on Monday night by giving the historical background of the struggle for human rights in the U.S.S.R. She was followed by Toronto lawyer Joseph Pomerant, Ontario Civil Liberties Union member associated with the Western Helsinki Agreement Monitoring Committees' members. He introduced Plyushch as a hero who paid an enormous price to force his government to actually enforce the human rights enshrined in the Soviet constitution. He said Plyushch was "a symbol that there will be justice."

Speaking through a translator, Plyushch explained in Ukrainian that he wished to give an account of what was happening in the U.S.S.R. and to analyze the reasons for the occurrence of these events. He then presented actual cases from the Soviet Union. He viewed the struggle for human rights in the U.S.S.R. as a struggle against totalitarianism. He was introduced as a Marxist and Socialist but referred to himself as a "Social Democrat" who opposes the "provocative totalitarianism which has unfortunately been systemized by the Soviet leadership."

"The Soviet regime," he says, "is undergoing an unparalleled socio-economic political crisis. The country, though naturally not the political elite, demands democratization. The intelligentsia, peasants and workers need power and political democratization. A contradiction now exists in the Soviet economic and political structures; a regime based on misinformation and lies cannot guide its economy. When the U.S.S.R. asked for Western aid it was surprised to encounter the Helsinki Agreement which it thought was a mere piece of paper. There is an increase in opposition to repression in the communist world as is evidenced by the support for Helsinki Monitoring Committees and the '77 Charter.'"

Plyushch also pointed out that "some capitalists like detente because Russia has a large market, some trade unionists want to increase trade to reduce unemployment, and some governments are scared and wish to obtain peace at all costs." He said the Soviet Union leadership is trying to overcome its fears by scaring others and must not be allowed to get away with not enforcing the human rights promised in the constitution.

The harassment of dissidents has become more "cynical and provocative since 1972." Except for the Medvedev brothers, none of the dissidents are opposed to Carter's policy. Plyushch gave as examples of the persecution the cases of Professors Orlov and Scharansky Tykh. He pointed out that all churches are persecuted. The Russian Orthodox Church, in Georgia, which is relatively free, had foisted upon it by the KGB a Patriarch who robbed the church blind. Plyushch claimed that in Georgia, though not in other republics, a Baptist even had his tongue and teeth torn out. Jews appear to be suffering severely because they are seen as a fifth column for their efforts in upholding human rights.

An interesting story he related involved "a certain Canadian, William Fawcett, who on May 20 of this year approached the wife of the Georgian dissenter Hamsakhuri. He said he was from the CIA and asked her to work for them. He claimed that the two members of her committee were actually KGB members and that he would smuggle her letters to her imprisoned husband. She immediately reported him to the KGB because she knew that no organization, not even the CIA, could penetrate the Russian camps and that it was a stupid KGB trick.

Plyushch concluded his speech by asserting that he did not understand how he could be criticized for supporting reactionaries in the west. He charged that the U.S.S.R.'s totalitarianism has become such a threat that it relegates the debate about communism and capitalism to a secondary position.

SOVIET ANTHEM

The Soviet Union has just acquired a slightly recycled national anthem. The anthem banned by Krushchev following his attack on the late Stalin, was cited at the 20th Party Congress, the one at which Krushchev delivered his "secret" anti-Stalin speech, as evidence for Stalin's mania for self-glorification. The offending stanza used to go like this:

Through the tempests the sunrises of freedom have cheered us,
Along the new path where great Lenin did lead.
But true to the people, thus Stalin has reared us,
Inspired us to labor and valorous deed!

The solution was simply to excise Stalin's name and replace it with Lenin's. The operation was performed by the same two authors who had originally penned the piece.

While the original, composed in 1943, netted the two men 100,000 rubles ($19,000) it is not known how much they are getting for the revision.

KFIR DOESN'T SELL

When the Israeli-produced Kfir (Lion Cub) jet fighter came out it was supposed to be a bargain that foreign generals would find hard to refuse. At the competitive price of between $5.25 to $5.50 million a piece, the aircraft is almost half the price of the Swedish Viggen and $2 million dollars less than the French Mirage F.1. An inferior American plane, the F-5, costs $5.5 million.

The projected sales, however, are not materializing. Early in the year, the U.S. blocked sales of the aircraft to Ecuador. It could do so because the American designed Pratt & Whitney engines used in the plane are manufactured in Israel under a license arrangement. Then, in May, Austria, which had promised to be a major buyer of the jet, gave in to Arab pressure and opted for the Viggen.

These setbacks may have serious repercussions for the Israeli aircraft industry. One of the country's largest employers, it is responsible for the salaries of approximately 20,000 people. Production of the Kfir alone keeps 2,500 workers busy. If sales do not improve the Israeli Air Force will be forced to take over the entire production.

GUERRILLA WAR IN WEST GERMANY

It was ironic that the same day The Lost Honour of Katherine Bloom, a film about German police and the methods they use to root out urban guerrillas, was playing at Cinema Lumiere, the guerrillas conducted one more kidnap. Hans-Martin Schleyer, president of the Employers Federation, was kidnapped on Monday by the Siegfried Hauser "commando". This time around it looks as if the guerrillas have the upper hand.

For one thing they are more numerous. While in April their numbers were estimated at 200 to 300 guerrillas and 4,000 active sympathisers the figures now are 1,200 guerrillas and 6,000 sympathisers. And the latest figures may be on the low side. In fact, the situation is serious enough for the government to use the term "civil war" in describing it.

The guerrillas are also better armed, informed and organized. Before the latest kidnap, for example, Schleyer's apartment in Cologne was kept under close observation without any fear from the commandos of being recognized. The police take this to mean that the Siegfried Hauser group is a new one.

The kidnap attempts are also getting more ruthless. Schleyer was kidnapped when his chauffeur braked to avoid colliding with a baby pram pushed in front of his car. The car came to stop beside a Volkswagen bus occupied by a group of machine-guns who opened fire, killing the chauffeur and the three police guards riding in a trailing car. The Swiss-made machine guns used in the kidnap were so powerful that they would have killed the chauffeur even if Schleyer's car had been bullet-proof.

The attack is the third one since April when public prosecutor Siegfried Buback (one of the villains in Katherine Bloom was shot dead. In July, Dresden Bank Chairman Jurgen Ponto was killed when two young women and a man tried to kidnap him and were resisted. The leader of the trio, 26-year old Susanne Albrecht, was the daughter of his best friend.

The Schleyer kidnappers are demanding the release of Andreas Baader (of the Meinhof-Baader gang) Gudrun Ensslin and Jan-Carl Raspe — the leaders — and eight others. In contrast to its unyielding position during the occupation of the Stockholm embassy two years ago, the government, headed by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, may take a more appeasing stance — if anything because no other policy is feasible. This, however, might get him in trouble with the Free Democrats whose support he needs to stay in power.

DISSIDENCE IN EAST GERMANY

Meanwhile, over in East Germany artists and intellectuals are coming under increased harassment by the authorities. It all started last November with the expulsion from East Germany of Wolf Biermann, well-known ballad singer and poet, and an avowed radical who is as critical of the West as he is of the regime in East Germany.

His expulsion was the cause of a wave of protest involving more than a dozen writers. The wave is now breaking on the solid ramparts of the bureaucracy. Those writers who protested openly against Biermann's expulsion have been expelled from the party and the Writer's Union and their works tacitly banned. Twenty people have been imprisoned while others have been forced to leave the country.

Among the victims:

- Sarah Kirsch, winner of literary awards in both East and West Germany. After she was expelled from the party she continued to protest against Biermann's forced emigration until she herself was forced to emigrate to West Germany.

- Poet Reiner Kunze left in April after he found it impossible to live with the "frightening methods of intimidation" resorted to by the government. Kunze gained notoriety in the early 1970's through the publication of an anthology of short stories and aphorisms called The Wonderful Years in which he described the terror used by the authorities to repress critical thinking among the young.

- Actor and folksinger Manfred Krug, who after being deprived of work and made the subject of vicious rumours, was granted an exit visa. His friend Jurek Becker has remained behind but refuses to shut up. "If it is a question of keeping my mouth shut," Becker said, "I would rather keep my mouth shut in the Bahamas."

THE VARSITY WORKSHOPS

As part of its recruitment campaign, The Varsity is holding two days of workshops on Monday, September 19 and Wednesday September 21. The schedule for the two days is as follows:

Although the workshops on the second day will probably be a repetition of those on the first day there will be room to expand on what was done the first day. People who attend the first workshop can therefore still profit from the second.

	Introduction to The Varsity.
1:00 - 2:00 p.m.	Tour of the building, talks by famous and not-so-famous veterans, refreshments.
3:00 - 4:00 p.m.	Writing workshop — news, feature, review and sports writing.
5:00 - 6:00 p.m.	Photography workshop.

Zola to be recognized by 10 vol. of letters

By STEPHEN ELLAMS

"People on't read me, that's for sure — at least they don't read me intelligently; and I suspect that twenty or fifty years after my death I shall be discovered."

Emile Zola

Zola's prophecy almost came to be self-fulfilling after his death by carbon-monoxide poisoning in 1902. He was posthumously honored by having his remains placed in the Pantheon in 1908 alongside such other eminent Frenchmen as Rousseau and Voltaire, but in the succeeding half century he was virtually ignored by scholars.

Now, 75 years after his death, the Zola Project based in the Robarts library is compiling a ten-volume collection of his letters. The chief editor is Professor Bard H. Bakker who is on loan from York University. The project is mainly funded by a Canada Council grant and the first volume is ready for delivery to the publishers, University of Montreal Press, for publication within a year.

When questioned as to why the edition was being published by the University of Montreal rather than the U of T Press, Professor Bakker said he would "have to be careful in his answer," and then went on to say that the U of T Press had been "interested" but their estimate of printing costs had been too high. He also added that Canada Council grants come from taxes and he believes public money should be "spread around a bit."

The ten-volume edition itself will contain a minimum of 10,000 letters of a personal and business nature written or received by Zola between 1858 and 1902. The projected press run is 2,000 copies per volume and as Professor Bakker says, it will "not exactly be a bestseller" but it is also "not just for literary historians."

The Zola Research Centre is a permanent, ongoing project and will continue to exist after the completion of the edition scheduled for the early 1990's. The centre will continue to accumulate material relating to Zola and his times for use by both students and scholars.

Professor Bakker confessed to feeling isolated in an "ivory tower" and stressed that the centre should provide service to both graduate and undergraduate students of French and that the centre is there for "anyone interested in Zola."

The centre itself is unique in North America and perhaps the world. This November, the Zola Centre is organizing a colloquy on L'Assommoir, the novel which first established Zola as a writer of the first rank. In attendance will be numerous scholars from France and America, including Professor Henri Mitterrand, perhaps the world's foremost Zola scholar.

The continuing relevance of Zola, the leader of the French naturalist school, to modern times is undisputed. Novels such as The Downfall, L'Assommoir and his masterpiece Germinal still speak clearly to us. Zola described his society's foibles and follies with biting wit and compassion and was not afraid to take an unpopular stand. His conduct during the Dreyfus Affair and publication of the famous open letter "J'Accuse" — for which he was tried and subsequently driven into exile — stands as fitting testimony to one man's fight against an inhuman bureaucracy.

In his funeral oration Anatole France described him as "the conscience of man" and through the Zola Centre that conscience lives on.

Anglophones on BILL 101

By JIM EDWARDS

Monday, a sunny but breezy day in Montreal, was the first day of classes for McGill's 15,000 students. Many of them were milling around on campus property, toting new supplies and heading in all probability for classes in unknown locations. But however hectic their pace, all those stopped and questioned could afford the time to voice their opinion on Quebec's newest and most controversial piece of legislation, Bill 101, usually referred to as "the language law".

Bill 101, which has made French the only official language in Quebec, imposes several limitations on English in business, and takes away the right of children to enrol in an English school unless at least one of their parents had been educated for at least three years in an English school in Quebec.

The McGill Administration is concerned that in the long run their enrolment, of which only 15 percent is French, will be adversely affected. A much larger percentage of their students are graduates of the English school system in Quebec. When Bill 1 was getting its readings, McGill published a memorandum urging the Levesque government not to pass the bill.

The following are the transcriptions of sixteen responses to the question, "What do you think of the new language legislation? Nineteen people were interviewed, and of them three had no opinion."

"I think 80 percent of the population of Quebec speak French. I think it's probably a good thing. Generally I think the intentions are good; the way they are going about it is not correct though. It's a bit too idealistic. It's founded on a beautiful ideal, and I think the end if good, but I don't know if the means justify it. I don't question the ideal, however.

Look at the rights people have outside of Quebec as far as speaking French is concerned. They have even less even after you have Bill 101 right now."

Jean Abrioux

• "No, I don't think it's a (Bill 101) a good thing. Well, obviously I'm not a separatist. I think it's aiming for separatism."

It's very difficult for anybody living on the North American continent not to speak English. And if you leave Quebec, if you're with a multinational corporation and if your kids have been brought up in French and have had little exposure to English, and if you move to another province or the states, your kids are going to suffer."

Mary Tatham

• "I don't think the English are going to let the legislation stand in their way. I don't think the Quebec English population will sit back and take it — they've proven themselves already in the fact that they won't sit back. A few people have gone against the law and enrolled their children illegally. Here probably we'll suffer a bit at McGill — quite a bit. They haven't received as much money from the government as they used to, so we're starting to go down. But getting back to the legislation — I don't think it will let it stop them."

• "I understand the position that the Quebecois are in; I can empathize with their being dominated by the English for all these years. But I'm also subjectively involved — it's (Bill 101) talking about taking away my language and my rights, so obviously I'm a bit against it. But as I say, I understand. Is it well intentioned? Yes, it's well intentioned for one particular part of the province, you know? It's understood that we're talking about a majority, but when you talk about a majority, you can't forget the minority either. Especially a minority who's been in power for all these years; a minority who's been used to having so many rights. You can't just deal with this minority as though it's just another small minority who never had any rights to begin with. Taking that into consideration, I'm against it, my being part of that minority group."

• That's a complicated question. Well, I think that the French are very into regulations, you know, they want to have rules written out, but once they're written out they're not very serious about keeping them — there are always a lot of exceptions with them. Taking that into consideration, things are not as strict as they seem. There's one section of the language legislation that's definitely unconstitutional. That's the part where they will not guarantee English in the courts."

• I don't think it's right. I'm not in favour of it. I'm French myself and I don't think it's very fair. It's anti-democratic. It's artificial, kind of forcing people to speak French. Well, I've got to run to catch my class."

• Well, I'm a foreign student studying at McGill. For me it's very hard to answer the question because I have no understanding of the French Canadians. But in my opinion, it's not a very mature way of thinking. In the long run they will lose everything that they have because they are trying to hold onto lands of their own... They are very nearsighted in the sense that there are so many other — like McGill, it's English, they are forerunners, they are leaders of the Canadians so the language policy is really stupid, to say it in a simple way. And for me, I'll have lots of problems because I'll have to learn French. I don't care very much; I'd rather learn French but not if somebody forces me to learn. I'd like to learn gradually, not in this way. You don't want to learn it in a sense because it becomes terrible — the other side doesn't understand you very much. I don't know about the language policy in great detail, but I don't like it anyway.

Wu-jan Lee

• I'm Swiss, so I'm neither for French nor for English, but I think people should have the choice. Otherwise we are in a dictatorship, like at the time in Germany. I think you should be able to make your free choice if you want to have your kids educated in English or in French. I think it's really wrong to impose anything like that."

Uli Trythall

Well, I'm a transfer student from the States and I can't speak French anyway. But from what I've heard about it, about making English people go to French schools if they aren't eligible for English schools, I disapprove. I know some people who have brothers and sisters who can't speak French at all and are terrible in English, but they have to go to a French school and learn a whole new language — they're just trying to speak English for the first time. They only speak something like Polynesian and I can see where that gets them into difficulty."

• It stinks. I'm not sticking around here anymore.

Julio

• I think it's going to do a lot of harm in the long run. I think it's going to be difficult. I haven't lived in the province, so I don't see how it's going to have any effect on me personally, because I'm going back to the States. Is it unfair? I'm really not sure whether it's unfair or not. I'm not totally against it."

• Well, I can sympathize with them to a certain degree, but I think they're going about it all wrong. They're right, they are natives of Canada. They should be able to have freedom to speak in their native French in, say, mid-western Ontario or for that matter Alberta. If they should happen to move there for job reasons or something, education should be available in French. But I don't think that the French ought to do what they're doing, because it contravenes the rights of a lot of English-speaking people who are well established here and a lot of English businesses that are well established. I can't offer any solutions. I think that they're really pushing it. They're moving much too fast."

• Does it menace the English community in Quebec? Not as I understand it, no. It doesn't menace the established community, but it forbids its growth. By forbidding the growth of English business in Quebec it's going to inhibit the growth of the English community. Eventually you're going to end up with a really French island and Quebec is going to be French right from the border through — no English at all. I can see that happening. Is that harmful? Well, I don't see any good coming out of it. Reactions are pretty strong against it."

Governing Council Summer Activities

By JACKIE LONDON

Not all of us were on vacation this summer; the Governing Council of the University of Toronto was still meeting in May, June and late August, and some policies were decided and some altercations were held. Here is a brief round-up of some of the more interesting items:

ACADEMIC AFFAIRS

One of the U of T's biggest paradoxes came before the Academic Affairs Committee in May: the U of T has had cut-backs for the 5th year in a row; however, the salary of its tenured staff keeps rising. Professor Salus noted that 90 per cent of the political economy staff is tenured, 100 per cent of the philosophy staff is tenured, and most of the staff are not even close to retirement age. Consequently, each department was asked to produce a five year plan in an attempt to draw up departmental budgets and study the current situation in each case individually.

When the Five-year plans were presented, Salus referred to feelings of isolation among teachers on the suburban campus. Those who divide their teaching time between the suburban and St. George campuses feel the pace is too hectic for their teaching, research and instructional duties.

Enrolment statistics in the five year plans indicate new trends: a shift of interest from medicine and law to business administration, and a drastic increase in enrolment in crash courses in French for those who have never studied it.

This year the Academic Affairs subcommittee is expected to re-examine the ruling that students taking a doctorate spend two full time years at university. The consensus is that a lot more dentists, doctors, lawyers and people in business taking part-time courses would like to come back and work up to a specialization without giving up a lucrative practice or job.

ADMISSIONS AND AWARDS

At a meeting early in May, the Admissions and Awards subcommittee decided to limit foreign pharmacy and dentistry student enrolment because of a shortage of pharmacists and dentists in Ontario. The extra spaces are needed, it was said, to train students who remain at home. Professors Langan, Marrus and Lister angrily denounced the decision as showing "protectionism and isolationism".

BUSINESS AFFAIRS

The U of T will operate with a deficit of $2.4 million next year according to figures in the final Income and Expenses Budget for 1977-78. Hardest hit will be the Royal Conservatory of Music which is being compelled to restrict its operations.

PLANNING AND PRIORITIES

Jean G. Lengelle, Warden of Hart House, charged that U of T is letting its $1.5 million collection of original Canadian paintings "deteriorate at an alarming rate". The collection comprising 250 paintings by such renowned Canadian artists as A. Y. Jackson, Tom Thomson, Lawren Harris and Emily Carr, among others, includes 59 which have been declared national treasures. Gordon Fisher, government appointee to the Governing Council, questioned the value of the collection as cultural development for students and suggested selling 10 of those classified as national treasures — that would bring in enough money to restore the other 49, plus provide money for another hundred paintings. Lengelle expressed "shock" at his "indecent proposal".

PLANNING AND RESOURCES

The Governing Council turned down an opportunity to purchase 11.6 acres of land adjacent to Erindale College. Cider Mill Development, owner of the property, is applying to the municipality for approval to use the land to build a subdivision. Professor F. Fox, Principal of Erindale, is horrified. He said the barbecues held by the people in the proposed units would damage the fauna and flora of the 200-acre campus. Presently, the campus has developed two wild salamanders of which one is a new breed unique in North America. There are ten research projects on the land which includes studies of ants and wasps. Apple trees are not sprayed because there is a group studying the worms in the apples. Last year Erindale students made over 3,500 field trips on their own campus.

INTERNAL AFFAIRS

Over 30,000 U of T students use 24 buildings which do not meet fire safety requirements, it was revealed at an Internal Affairs Committee meeting. To meet just the minimum standards will cost the university an estimated $4,745,375. Of the 24 substandard buildings, 16 have no sprinklers, 4 have no hoses, 7 lack stairs and fire escapes, 15 lack fire separation doors at stairs and/or corridors, 5 lack fire separation at laboratory doorways into corridors and 2 lack fire separation between floors.

One of the substandard buildings is Hart House which houses the aforementioned $1.5 million collection of original Canadian paintings. Some buildings, such as the Mining Building, have insulation that has become flammable with age but they are not slated for any kind of fire prevention because they will eventually be torn down. They are used daily by students nevertheless. Campus firefighters are trying to whip up some concern in Governing Council meetings.

Students organize on national unity question

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

"There is more to being a committed Canadian than simply singing 'Oh Canada' or waving a flag" according to Commitment Canada co-executive directors Scott Erskin and Joan Brydson.

Commitment Canada will be holding its first symposium to promote national unity next month and Erskin insists that "active separatists will not be encouraged to attend. There is nothing more we can do to appease them."

The purpose of Commitment Canada, he adds, is to "put the ideas of students together and discuss possible solutions for the dilemma of Quebec so that we get a greater insight into what Quebec wants. However, we're concerned with the entire country. We must combat the 'let Quebec go' attitude."

Commitment Canada, a non-profit organization, was founded on a national basis last November, soon after the Quebec election which saw pro-separatist Rene Levesque, elected premier.

The organization is also apolitical. There are, however, some members from all political parties with membership in the various chapters, though none are politicians. The U of T chapter, one of about 25 was founded in the summer of 1977.

Among the concepts to be discussed at this symposium are the feasibility of bilingualism in Canada and the feasibility of separation for Quebec and Canada. The panel members at the first meeting in October (the date is still to be determined) will all be from Quebec, and will all be bilingual. After they present their views, a research panel will assess the information presented and give position papers stating their overall synopsis with possible solutions at a subsequent meeting to be held early in 1978.

According to Erskin, these meetings will be open to anyone who signs with Commitment Canada. Membership and meetings are free of charge he said; the organization would prefer that members have time to dedicate, but interested people with little time to spare will still be allowed membership and information will be sent to them through the mail as it becomes available.

Erskin said in two weeks' time there will be an organizational meeting to inform all members about the organization of the symposium. "By that time we'll know the names and background of the people on panel."

He added that students and other interested parties may sign up with Commitment Canada at their desk in the lobby of Sydney Smith Hall until Friday afternoon.

So far, according to Erskin, there has "not been an overwhelming response" although 15 people joined during the first day and a half of recruiting. Erskin says he is looking for a total of "25 to 50 people this week" to join, and in an effort to achieve that goal, brochures are available at the desk.

Incidentally, the brochure is in English only, a cause "of some criticism" according to Erskin. "Some people criticise us because we promote national unity, yet put out a brochure in one language." He stated that a bilingual brochure would require a larger, more costly pamphlet. Another reason, he said was that "we assumed most people at the U of T can speak English. But basically, it was for economic reasons, to save money."

In addition to the brochure, on Wednesday or Thursday of this week, a newspaper on Commitment Canada will be available at the same location.

At one point during the recruiting, one girl who signed up for Commitment Canada made the remark "I'm a member of the Liberal Party, and everyone knows that Liberals and national unity go together." Erskin told her that the organization was non-political, and after she left, he remarked "we try to discourage that sort of thing."

For fans of national unity seminars, 1977 is turning out to be a vintage year. There was a summer symposium at York University. Following the U of T symposium by Commitment Canada, there will be a follow-up symposium by the same group at York University. Also, on the U of T campus, from October 13-16, another symposium will be taking place called "Alternatives Canada." Pat Malloy, chairman of Alternatives Canada insists that his organization "is an ad hoc committee that has no aim in pushing Canadian unity." Instead, Alternatives Canada will discuss such topics as "regionalism, arts, culture, language and the economics and politics of separation."

Evans cuts ribbon at metro library

Science and Engineering moves in

The old Metropolitan Toronto Library at College and St. George streets became the new if only temporary quarters for the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering. Opening ceremonies were held Monday afternoon on the front steps of the building. The engineers lost their traditional home, the Sandford Fleming Building, when it was irreparably damaged by fire last February.

In a blare of Lady Godiva trumpets, Associate Dean designate of the faculty, Wasy Janischewskyj, backed by a line of nattily suited officiates sporting canary-yellow hard hats, opened the ceremonies and introduced U of T president John Evans.

Evans, similarly attired, initiated his remarks with a jocular reference to the dual nature of the faculty's move: "the first half to the library, the second to the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry" (located beside the old Metro library).

Evans proceeded to thank Alex Rankin, Vice-President of the Business Affairs Committee of the Governing Council, for his role in effecting the transfer (neatly including a reference to Rankin's imminent climb to associate dean).

Also present at the ceremonies was Transitional Year Program (TYP) director Marty Wall, who will also be conducting his courses in the library. Wall explained it was with "renewed optimism, renewed hope" that TYP (a university upgrading program that was shut down during last year in controversy over the course content) was beginning, and that it was "appropriate that our program has found its home here."

The honor of cutting the blue and white ribbon fell to Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering Dean Ben Etkin, who spoke of "the road that took us to City Hall, that took us to politics, and to one of our own alumni, Paul Godfrey" in the march to the temporary quarters. Etkin neatly scissored the ribbon and welcomed the bystanders to "wander through the building."

The final ritual was performed by the students: a small group of engineering students dressed in black and armed with billy sticks and chains lit a miniature cannon amidst the rousing cheers of the engineers. A miniature boom was heard, the squad in black disappeared with the cannon into the trees and the dignitaries disappeared to, presumably, wander through the building.

The engineers gave Dr. John his own hat when he opened their new home on Monday.

STAR TREK'S SCOTTY: OUT OF THIS WORLD ENTERTAINMENT

Get set to go completely out of your mind. Coming to Convocation Hall, September 20th at 8:00 p.m.: Scotty, Star Trek's indefatigable Engineering Officer will be reporting in for a night loaded with wit and humor. Tickets are available on the downtown campus at the SAC Office, 12 Hart House and other SAC ticket outlets at Scarborough and Erindale. General Admission is $3.50, with the special reduced rate of $2.50 being charged to U of T students.

We all know that adventure and a roving spirit is in Lieutenant Montgomery Scott of the StarShip Enterprise's blood, as is the thrill of coming to Toronto for James Doohan who plays Scotty. Doohan is a native of Vancouver and served in the Royal Canadian Air Force. He is also a pioneer in television, having acted in close to a thousand live, taped and filmed shows.

Over at the SAC office itself, things have been abuzz for weeks, since the news first came in that Scotty was due to arrive. "I can only hope that The Force is with him," Brian O'Riordan, SAC's University Government Commissioner, said. "Beam me to Con Hall," John Doherty, External Commissioner, appealed. Ever watchful, Vice-President Dave Jones added this cautionary note, though: "Could Scotty's real purpose in coming to the U of T be to start a campaign as President of Engineering?"

Could be, but we doubt it, Dave. Scotty has no desire to command a space vessel. He has always been completely loyal to Captain Kirk and the Enterprise.

The evening of Tuesday, September 20th promises to be a great success, with Trekkies of all ages swarming in from all over the city.

Scotty is just the first of many speakers, covering a wide range of expertise, who SAC will be bringing to the U of T campus this coming year.

Star Trek's Scotty at Convocation Hall.

SURVIVAL WORKSHOPS

In a continuing effort to make life better for University of Toronto undergraduate students, SAC has undertaken to provide a series of Survival Workshops. All workshops will be held in the mezzanine Study-Lounge at Sid Smith, the downtown campus, room 2138 at 2:00 p.m.

The first workshop on Tuesday, September 20th will cover the important topic of money, specifically O.S.A.P. Chris Ainut, an O.F.S. researcher, and Patrick Phillips, U of T Director of Student Awards, will discuss how to make the most out of the award's program. Be sure to bring your account.

Wednesday, September 21st will see a sexuality workshop at Sid Smith entitled "Hang Up Your Hang Ups". Rhonda Katz, a Sexual Therapist who works for the U of T Advisory Bureau, will attempt to sooth all of our ravaged brows.

If you are having legal hassles, Thursday, September 22nd and Friday, September 23rd should be marked down on your calendar. On Thursday, David Bryce from the Campus Legal Aid Centre will be discussing the Landlord-Tenant Act and Rent Review. Friday, David Chong, also from CLAC, will talk on the subject "Know Your Rights/You and The Law".

All of these workshops look to be straight talk on important subjects by people who know what they are talking about.

GERALD GODIN TO SPEAK AT INNIS GREENPEACE, CANATOM TO DEBATE

Keen judgement and a sense of responsibility will be called for as SAC starts off the new school year by bringing two exciting events to campus.

A packed house is expected when Gerald Godin, Parti Quebecois Member of the National Assembly, takes on the subject of Quebec's future, Tuesday, September 20th at 12:00 p.m. at Innis Town Hall. Admission is free and a question and answer period will follow.

The next day, September 21st, will see a debate between Doug Saunders, Greenpeace spokesman and Alan Wyatt, Vice-President of Canatom (Ontario) Limited as they look into the question of Nuclear Power/Energy or Extinction? at 12:00 p.m. in the Hart House Debates Room. Mr. Saunders is Co-Ordinator for Project No-Nuc, while Mr. Wyatt is a Consulting Engineer in the Nuclear Power and Heavy Water Field.

SAC has continually brought some of the most important figures in world politics to Toronto and Mr. Godin certainly follows in that tradition. As a crusading journalist and the man who beat Robert Bourassa in his own riding, Mr. Godin will have a lot to say about Quebec At The Crossroads.

Claiming that nuclear power must be taken out of the hands of bureaucrats and put into the hands of the people, Doug Saunders, a graduate of the U of T, will be facing Alan Wyatt, who believes that the peaceful applications of nuclear energy are a benefit to society.

SAC STABLES OPEN

This year SAC will be making horse sense. Undertaking the sole management of the Riding School at Scarborough College, SAC has once again appointed Sue Grasser to continue as head of operations.

Sue was very busy this past summer as the stables' paths and show area were first constructed and then reconstructed after a heavy storm overflowed Highland Creek.

No prior riding experience is necessary if you wish to cut in on the special student rates of $3.50 for trails and $5.50 for lessons. The only thing that would be appreciated, though, is that you give Sue a call at 282-5309, so she can book you in at a good time. With some nice weather still in store for us, make sure you get your call in early.

The Scarborough Riding School is the only stable owned and operated by a Student Council in Canada. It's quite a unique experience all the way around.

SAC hopes more downtown and Erindale people will take advantage of this service. Campus wide travel is encouraged by use of the U of T shuttle bus.

Sue Grasser, the Stable's Manager, brings a great deal of skill and knowledge to her job. As a full time student in physical therapy, Sue has already combined both interests in her past work experience. Having helped people with cerebral palsy and polio develop their muscles while learning to ride, Sue sees this SAC service in both a recreational and serious light.

The Riding School looks to put together a fine Riding Team this year and we all hope you go down that way to have a looksee. It's a pleasant trip and the twelve horses at the stables just love visitors.

The Lady In Charge: Sue Grasser and friends.

Do you like your football, as Coselli says, up close and personal?

Are striped shirts becoming on you?

Are you in good physical condition and do you have some free time in the afternoon, or evenings, or weekends? How's your memory?

If you can answer "yes" to most of the above (and if you'd like to earn some spending money in an enjoyable way with some interesting people), then consider becoming a football official.

The University Football Officials Association needs officials to work in the U of T intramural football league and in several high school and touch leagues as well. Previous experience as a player or official is helpful but by no means essential.

Jule clinics will be held Thursday, Sept. 15 and Friday, Sept. 16 in lecture room 304, Benson Building, starting at 5 p.m. Clinic instruction will include rules, the proper uniform (you don't necessarily have to look foolish in a striped shirt and white pants) and effective officiating techniques.

Additional information is available from the Intramural Office, room 106 Hart House, or by phoning 651-5824 or 465-5224.

Officials are also needed for all the other team sports in the men's and women's intramural program. Sign up in either room 106, Hart House, or room 102, Benson Building.

Athletic department reorganized

The organization of athletics on the St. George campus took on a new dimension as of May 1 when the formerly separate U of T men's and women's athletic associations were merged into a single unified Department of Athletics and Recreation.

Director of the new department is

A. J. Fraser, a former athletic director at the University of Manitoba. Fraser came to U of T last year from a senior sports administration position in the federal government.

As part of the reorganization, several offices were moved between the Benson Building and the former men's area in the athletic wing of Hart House.

The former men's intercollegiate office, traditionally located in Hart House room 101, is not part of the Excellence Program office, situated in Benson Building room 226. Dalt White, men's athletic director at the time of the merger, was appointed co-ordinator of the excellence program. The associate co-ordinator is Liz Hoffman, coach of the women's field hockey team.

The other program sections are: — Instruction (non-competitive, non-credit skills and enjoyment courses in aquatics, dance and several other recreational activities). Co-ordinator is Anne Hewett. Office: room 301 Benson Building, 978-3436.

— Recreation (includes the men's and women's intramural and co-ed recreation programs). Co-ordinator is Dave Copp, room 106 in Hart House (978-3082); associate co-ordinator Sharon Bradley is situated in room 102, Benson Building (978-3441).

— Fitness (includes fitness testing and several fitness programs). Co-ordinator Robin Campbell can be found in the Fitness Office, Hart House room 104 (978-3084); associate co-ordinator Linda Coutts has moved from the Benson Building to Campbell's old office in Hart House room 107.

A new reservations and ticket office has been established in Hart House room 101. The office is responsible for reservations for all the athletic facilities on the St. George campus, including the gyms in the Benson Building, plus Varsity Stadium and Arena.

The office staff also handle tickets for all Blues football and hockey games. Additional information regarding reservations and tickets is available by phone, 978-4115.

Women's Orientation

The second annual orientation to Women's Athletics at University of Toronto will be held Monday, September 19, at 7:00 p.m. in the Benson Building. This orientation has been planned to familiarize all women with the Women's Athletics program.

A skit featuring the history of Women's Athletics at U of T will be performed.

After the skit, all participants will form into teams. These teams will then move from station to station throughout the Benson Building, following a trail of clues. At each station, the teams will learn through participation the mechanics of the various sports in Women's intramurals.

After visiting all the dark recesses of the building (which nobody ever knew existed) the orientation will wind down in the Lounge with an informal discussion period over refreshments.

Hang up your cleats and write Varg sports

Get tangled up in your work.

The Varsity is on the hunt for people on campus who have an interest in sports writing. Don't worry about being a rookie. We've rescued the odd marginal illiterate and fostered some Scott Young's of our own. A working knowledge of sports and a willingness to learn photography are decided assets. So come on out and see us. There are a lot of hockey, basketball, and checkers matches that deserve coverage. So pole vault over and pay us a visit.

Brave new world: Evans tells all

By JACKIE LONDON

A major change in the government funding policy for universities was revealed by U of T President John Evans in his major speech of the year before Governing Council last night.

Speaking to the executive committee of the council, Evans outlined the type of world in which the universities will be moving in years to come.

After a period of massive growth, he said, student enrolment is decreasing. The provincial government, which formerly funded undergraduates according to numbers will now provide subsidies according to the quality of education.

At the graduate level, the freeze on funds is being lifted; the new policy is now being implemented for undergraduates.

Other points in Evans' speech included:

- Universities will face limits on the money available for higher education, more regulations will be imposed by external agencies on how university money is being spent, and the use of formal bodies to settle disputes will increase.
- Ontario university enrolments, which were expected to rise by 5½ percent rose only 2 to 3 percent. Enrolments in graduate schools dropped drastically because of the poor employment prospects. U of T and Guelph University are the exceptions. Fifty-one percent of graduating Grade XIII students listed U of T as their first choice, while 41 percent listed Guelph.
- U of T is "beefing up" its counselling and advisory services to deal with student unemployment.
- The Update Campaign begun in April

1976 with a goal of $25 million in five years has raised $16 million so far. Montreals have contributed over a million dollars to the fund and the biggest donor is the R. Samuel McLaughlin Foundation which donated $1 million for a Chair in Surgery.

• Ontario universities have dropped their old habits of trying to emulate one another's best departments and are concentrating instead on improving those departments in which they can best offer Ontario students more alternatives.

• The Canadian Committee Financing University Research is moving in a more positive direction to research funding. A desire to relate to special missions and projects is manifested by their taking on indirect costs as well as the more obvious costs.

• The Sanford Fleming Progress Report indicates that costs of renovation will exceed $1 million. The structure is sound, the "splendid curving facade" will be preserved, and the fourth floor will be extended.

• Interim arrangements to house the Sanford Fleming Building students in the former Public Library at St. George and College ran into a snag when a "stop order" was put on renovations. Putting their heads together, professors came up with a list of renovations that could be done by September and that did not require a building permit.

The result is "gracious but in a 12th century sense" said Evans. "Those there will learn to love it," he continued. U of T has taken a four year lease on the building.

Gargoyle revived after long absence

By TOM KUHN

The Gargoyle is back after a ten-year absence from University College (UC).

What was once one of the most renowned university journals in Canada has been revived by the UC Literary and Athletic Society.

The monthly journal, which may publish every three weeks, will concentrate on reviews, criticism, prose, poetry, and feature stories, according to its editor, Wayne Olsheski.

"We'll also have a good sports section since UC is involved in interfaculty sports," Olsheski said.

Although interest in the paper at UC has already shown itself to be high, writers, layout people, photographers, and even cartoonists are still being encouraged to contact the editor at the UC Lit office in the Junior Commons Room (hidden in a corner of the UC Quadrangle), said Olsheski.

Chris Brown, president of "the Lit", and one of the main forces behind the revival of the Gargoyle, said the paper is needed to establish an identity at UC.

"UC wants to develop a sense of identity, a sense of college. One way is by having a newspaper. People can read it and know it is UC news, UC information," said Brown.

Tying off-campus students with those in residence is a perpetual problem at U of T. Olsheski sees the Gargoyle as serving as such a tie between the two groups of students at UC.

"One purpose of the Gargoyle is to unify the UC community. Before the Gargoyle, there were few things off-campus students could relate to. The paper serves as sort of a bond between off-campus and residence students," said Olsheski.

Olsheski added he was happy to see the interest of off-campus students in the paper.

Although the main motive behind the revival of the Gargoyle was the need for UC information, Olsheski insists that its main contribution will be to allow UC students a forum to express views and exchange ideas.

Students have approached Olsheski on having a scientific section, with math puzzles and columns on things happening at UC. Olsheski added he would like to have a news or feature coverage on such things as college council restructuring, Lit meetings, interviewing staff, and research into courses at UC.

Olsheski is looking forward to a fulfilling year with the Gargoyle he said. He has worked the past few years on The Varsity.

"I want to see the Gargoyle off the ground. I want to see it go," Olsheski said. "At one time the Gargoyle was a great journal. I believe talent is still there," he added.

Ex-Varg staffer Wayne Olsheski makes good.

Jones, King media presentation hot item at SAC board meeting

By BLAIR HUNTER

The Campus as the Campus Centre came up as the hottest item on the agenda of the first student council (SAC) Board of Directors meeting last Wednesday in Simcoe Hall.

If any of the energy generated by The Campus as the Campus Centre crusaders is transmitted to the student body, then the physical layout of the St. George Campus may be greatly altered.

SAC Vice-President Dave Jones and SAC Architecture Director Steve King gave a stimulating thirty minute multi-media presentation of The Campus as the Campus Centre project. One purpose of the display was to show how close the Governing Council has come in the past to adopting measures along the lines of the current Campus as the Campus Centre proposals.

"If we really care about the quality of life on campus," Jones said, "then SAC delegates would communicate to their constituents the note of urgency in supporting this project."

More than a facile beautification program, The Campus as the Campus Centre project is designed in its initial stages to revitalize the south-western end of the downtown campus.

This would include the closing of Willcocks and Huron Streets to motor vehicles. The roadway and parking lots would be turned into a habitable green belt. In addition, a restructured St. George Street would be restricted to two lanes of traffic, thus facilitating the construction of a boulevard.

The Student Council Board of Directors meeting also heard SAC External Affairs Commissioner John Doherty outline the planned strategy for upcoming student aid campaigns. Cards addressed to Prime Minister Trudeau were made available for distribution to the student body. These cards ask Trudeau to establish a realistic federal student aid plan.

Communications commissioner Doug Gerhart officially unveiled the new SAC logo. The pros and cons of this new logo were briefly banded about. In addition to accepting the new logo, the council decided to keep in use a restylized version of the old SAC emblem.

How to recognize an exhibitionist when you see him

By KEN WHITEHURST

Men who are between 20 and 24 years of age are the most likely to be exhibitionists, according to a booklet recently published by the Provincial Secretariat for Justice, titled "Exhibitionism", that is one of a set of booklets intended to inform the public about the nature and effects of common legal offenses.

The booklet provides clinical and legal definitions of exhibitionism, which is a criminal offense. The booklet says that the clinical definition of exhibitionist acts does not include "females who expose themselves, streaking, exposing the buttocks, nude bathing, males exposing to other males, the uncovering of the male genitals as a prelude to sexual activity between a consenting male and female or sexual contact."

Exhibitionist acts, according to the booklet, meet the following conditions: "a male is somehow able to draw an unsuspecting female's attention to his exposed genitals, the penis may be either erect or not erect, there may be full or partial exposure, the act is usually not pre-planned as to time and place, but may be the result of a sudden urge on the spur of the moment or the climax of a build-up over several days, there is no intent to seek sexual contact."

"Most exhibitionists are between 20 and 30 years of age, with the greatest number in the 20 to 24 range," says the booklet. Cases involving men over 30 are increasingly rare in succeeding age groups, and "When an exhibitionist act is carried out by a man over 40, some other factor such as alcoholism or premature senility is usually involved."

The book profiles the exhibitionist as a man with average to above average intelligence, but who is an "underachiever", with average or above average physical appearance, though they consider themselves unattractive, and with a narrow range of sexual experiences and prudish sexual ideals. The exhibitionist is likely to be married and able to have normal sexual relations, but he feels very inadequate in most social situations.

The booklet claims there is a good chance most females will encounter an exhibitionist at some time in their lives.

Females who encounter an exhibitionist should "report the incident to the police, be aware that there is little or no danger, try to note such details as an address or license number if the offender is exposing himself from a house, apartment or car, leave as quickly as possible if the act occurs in an isolated or out of the way place" and control visible reactions of anger and outrage, because a strong reaction is what the exhibitionist seeks.

The booklet also tells how to know if a person who is exposing himself is not an exhibitionist, how a victim should report exhibitionism, how persons close to a victim should respond to the incident, how professional and other workers should respond to an incident, how children should be educated about it, what are appropriate attitudes for the exhibitionist's family and how exhibitionists can get help for their problem.

The secretariat prepared this booklet and others, on different offenses like impaired driving, as a resource to be used by parents, teachers, youth workers, police and others who work with young people.

A simple, fictional story about a typical example of exhibitionism begins the booklet.

"It was a bright sunny day and Sue had decided to walk to the store for a change. Lost in her own thoughts she failed to notice the young man signalling to her from his car and rapping on the window to catch her attention.

"Could you give me some directions please? I seem to be lost." Hearing the voice, she turned and walked towards the car. As she came close to the window she stopped in horror. The man had his genitals exposed and was masturbating, while his eyes never left her face. 'You filthy disgusting pig!' she shouted, and then bolted away.

The stranger started up his car and drove off in the opposite direction before Sue was aware that she had not noted the license number. When she turned back she realized angrily that she also hadn't looked at the young man's face and would not be able to describe him to the police...

When Sue got home she was extremely upset. Her family wasn't much help to her because, like herself, they did not understand what exhibitionism was all about. When told of what happened, her mother became worried, her brother laughed, and her father seethed with rage. Sue was totally confused and began to cry. Her suffering could have been greatly reduced if only she and her family had an understanding of the problem and how to deal with it properly."

Copies of "Exhibitionism" and other booklets in the series can be obtained free of charge from the Ontario Government Book Store at 880 Bay Street.

External affairs claims jurisdiction unclear

By GORDON HERTZMAN

The External Affairs Committee questioned its own existence in a boardroom meeting at Simcoe Hall Wednesday afternoon.

"Maybe we should self-destruct ourselves," Chairman John Cowan remarked. Joyce Foster from the Alumni added, "I want to know why we exist".

The External Affairs Committee was created originally to establish relations between the university and the outside community. But as a result of the efforts of the Department of Information Services, the Department of Alumni Affairs, and the Department of Private Funding, the committee feels there is little it can do in external affairs without entering the jurisdiction of these other groups.

Chairman Cowan said the committee had not accomplished a great deal in the past. While it has appointed a liaison officer between the university and the "real world," and has helped to co-ordinate the operations of the other groups such as Alumni Affairs with a central university policy, the committee still faces a light agenda at its meetings. Presently, the committee's task lies in "filling in the gaps" left by the other groups involved in external relations once it has been established what these gaps are.

Yet Chairman Cowan said he didn't want to "go around chasing useless work."

One new member of the Committee felt they should play an important role in tearing down the "ivory walls" and alleviating the "general hostility" felt in the outside community towards the university. She said "we have to interpret ourselves" to the surrounding community.

The agenda for that day, however, did contain a number of reports from the three university groups represented by the External Affairs Committee.

Mrs. Wilson of the Department of Information Services was told that recent interviews with people from the university "don't come off as well as they might," and that guidelines be proposed on how to handle "hostile interviewers" from the media; she agreed that that was an "excellent suggestion." In fact, a handout has been prepared on how to handle the media, to be distributed throughout the institution, even to the telephone operators. The department's objectives are to "persuade the public that the university is a worthwhile institution," as well as to persuade people that their money was "well spent".

The Department of Private Funding reported it had received two to three million dollars in pledges so far, and it was considerably ahead of its previous projections.

The Department of Alumni Affairs presented a report of its activities. These consisted of various projects from fund raising and scholarships to running winter courses in Florida for vacationing alumnae. E. B. M. Pinnington, Director of Alumni Affairs agreed that some items could be removed to reduce the department's budget. $400,000 alone has been allotted for its publications section.

SAC presses for Campus as Campus Centre

By CHERYL APPLEBAUM

For twenty-three years the student council (SAC) has labored to improve the quality of life on the St. George campus through the Campus as Campus Centre project. Again this year, SAC is pressuring the university to get it under way.

This endeavor would mean better eating facilities as well as commercial space; entertainment, better and less expensive accommodations, people oriented buildings and green areas. Most of all, it would mean that U of T would become part of the community from which it is presently alienated.

Phase One of the project has been dangling in limbo since 1973, when it was first approved by the Presidential Advisory Committee and the Governing Council, U of T's top governing body. The Business Affairs committee on the governing council even went as far as to place the proposal third on its list of priorities, behind Innis College and the athletic complex.

But that was as far as it progressed. Both bodies agreed that Wilcocks and Huron Streets from Spadina to St. George between Russell and Harbord will be closed to traffic and then landscaped, complete with pond and amphitheatre, while St. George itself would be reduced to two lanes with a central, grassed boulevard. Also, The Bazaar, an annexation to Sid Smith will house fast food and commercial outlets, a pub, lounge space, banks, bookstores and game rooms.

In 1975, however, the governing council decided that The Bazaar had to be self-supporting, according to SAC vice-president and project chairman Dave Jones. A decision by the administration unprecedented in the history of any project development.

Evidently, most of the Bazaar can pay for itself (commercial space, pubs, etc.), but the other areas cannot, so, Jones stated "... in the final tally the building would pay for all yearly operating expenses and the mortgage bills on $1.3 million. The building, however, was projected to cost $1.7 million, hence the administration concluded it was NOT self-financing."

Thus, Jones and Campus as Campus Centre committee members are putting on the pressure with a huge campaign to make students more aware of the problems.

Slide shows, discussions with student councils from all colleges and faculties, pamphlets, buttons are all part of the efforts. Also planned are SAC representatives of the scheme attending the next planning and Resources meeting in October, as well as a massive letter-writing campaign by U of T students and project sympathizers.

Summer Days May Yet Return

Some people may have missed the item in the news yesterday that Mark Rudd, one of the leaders of the Weather Underground faction of the Students for a Democratic Society, surrendered to the FBI. Rudd, who is now 30, jumped bail in 1970 and became one of the most wanted men on the FBI's list.

Whether Rudd turned himself in because he couldn't take the strain any longer or because he was part of an "inversion" plan by the Weather Underground to return to the surface and carry out the fight in the open, his surrender is significant, not his motives.

Along with the recent attempt to obliterate the site of the Kent State killings, Rudd's surrender comes as the finishing touch to the burial of the student movement as it was known a decade ago.

The question is, will there be a resurrection? And will students ever again understand the enormous power they can wield if they unite together?

In 1968 they could not fail to understand that. The war in Vietnam demonstrated in incontrovertible fashion that ordinary people — in Vietnam it was peasants — can, despite the wrath of the largest power on earth, take their lives in their hands and change them. "L'imagination au pouvoir", though originating in France, was a slogan that students all over the world could easily make their own. Let imagination loose, let people get a glimpse of how different their lives could be, let them imagine what they could do if they set their minds to it and things would be changed on the spot.

They almost were. What killed the revolt was the very spontaneity that had initially made it so exhilarating and infectious. The spontaneous rejection by thousands of the established pattern of life was the basis of the revolt. The Days of Rage, however, could not last forever on pure spontaneity. Without direction and strategy the movement quickly shattered itself against the solid front presented by the forces of order, which in France included the Communist Party. The "hot autumns", as they were called at the time, gave way to a cool period of reaction.

There are enough similarities between the student revolt of the '60's and what happened in Russia in 1905 to suggest a comparison. In 1905 Russia was hit by a series of strikes and revolts that brought the country close to revolution. The government hastily enacted a few reforms, promised more and crushed those who wanted the revolt to continue. By 1912, order reigned supreme and the Tsar has reconsolidated the autocracy. In fact the quietism that followed the collapse of the 1905 revolt was so widespread and prolonged that in 1917 Lenin was still saying that he would not live to see the revolution. In February of that year the Tsar was deposed. In October the Bolsheviks took power at the head of a spontaneous popular upsurge, signed a separate peace with Germany and established a soviet republic.

1968 may well turn out to have been the West's 1905. The real upheaval might be around the corner. There has been for example, a resurgence of student activism in Italy, and in Germany the government is faced with what it itself describes as "civil war". In Europe summer days may yet return.

Right here in Canada, however, the student movement remains a fiction. The only comment we would like to make is this: whenever students have been active it has never been because they wanted to roll back a $100 tuition fee or because they couldn't find a job during the summer. Those things are important but if history is anything to go by, we would have to conclude that the next period of student activism in Canada will be the result of political rather than economic dislocation. Remember the student radicals of the '60's were probably better off than the average student today. Economic hardship was certainly not the activating factor. If anything, the increased cost of education has made students more determined than ever to stick to their studies.

In the coming months we hope to analyze in depth the decline of the student movement and the necessary conditions for its revival. We invite all those who have thoughts on the subject to submit them.

No grant proposal for professional students

By KEN WHITEHURST

If you are planning to be a doctor, lawyer, dentist or teacher, then starting in 1978-1979 accomplishing your goal will likely cost you more.

Proposed changes in the Ontario Student Assistance Plan (OSAP) that will separate the province's grant program from the Canada Student Loans Plan (CSLP) will make professional students ineligible for provincial grants, according to Carole Vaughan, Executive Assistant to Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott.

Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) Researcher Chris Allnutt says that at the University of Toronto 63 per cent of medical students, 57 per cent of law students, 72 per cent of dental students and 66 per cent of education students were OSAP-assessed applicants. Most of these students will qualify for grants under the existing grant program, but they will be ineligible for the grant next year.

COST NO DETERRENT

The conservation of provincial funds and a belief that students entering professional schools will not be deterred, regardless of economic background, by having to take out loans to complete their education were cited by Vaughan as reasons for making professional students ineligible for the provincial grants.

Responding to information from John Bonner, Student Assistance

Planner for the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, published in Monday's Varsity, Allnutt said that Bonner was "off base" on some of his points.

Bonner said that the new grants program will have fairer criteria for determining what a student's contribution to his education should be. The new criteria will be based on actual summer earnings rather than the arbitrary CSLP expected earnings.

ABOUT FACE

The new ministry position is an about face, claims Allnutt, because as recently as July of this year the ministry was refusing to accept this approach, which OFS has long advocated, because the ministry claimed the proposal would penalize students with high summer earnings.

Bonner has a different perception of what happened. He said that the ministry has, for two years, basically agreed with OFS's position on this point, but he said they wanted advice on how to best implement the idea.

It has been only recently, he claims, that a satisfactory proposal was made by OFS to the ministry about how to do the first assessment of student earnings. The first assessment has to be done in June, July and August while most students are still working.

Consequently, Bonner thinks, "the ministry's position is not an about face but rather a reasonable compromise."

Allnutt charged that the provincial government is reducing its support for graduate scholarships, and that Bonner's earlier statements that the province was prepared to support students who showed exceptional merit were misleading.

AWARDS

2,751 awards were given out by the province at a cost of $5.7 million in 1969-70 compared with only 945 awards this year at a cost of $3.9 million, according to Allnutt.

Allnutt's 1969-70 figures are, Bonner responded, those from a now defunct provincial program that was called the Ontario Graduate Fellowship Program. These fellowships were distributed by the universities themselves, which determined their own criteria for distribution.

The program that presently exists is the Ontario Graduate Scholarships (OGS). An independent provincial panel decides who should receive the scholarships.

Bonner admits that the budget for OGS is smaller than for the fellowship program, but he points out that the OGS budget has been getting larger since that program started.

He also noted that the number of people receiving scholarships varied according to the independent panel's determination of how many deserving graduate students there are, and that consequently, the number of scholarships would vary from year to year.

Both SAC and OFS have criticised Parrott for not planning one of his regional meetings about the new grant program for U of T where there may be strong opposition to the program. Parrott's executive assistant, Vaughan, said that it was decided to hold the meeting at Seneca College rather than somewhere else, because the Seneca auditorium can seat the most people comfortably. That meeting will be October 5th.

ROM gets another facelift

By JILL SPRACKMAN

The Royal Ontario Museum (ROM) is undergoing a facelift beginning this year designed to double the present floor space while preserving the historic characteristics that distinguish it.

Earlier in the summer the turnstiles were removed from the main rotunda entrance, and replaced by a circular information booth. The hope of the museum staff is that this will create a more open and inviting atmosphere than existed before.

The actual first phase of the construction and renovations are scheduled to begin in February of next year with the demolition of the Exhibition Hall. The completion date for all renovations is expected to be sometime in 1981.

David Young, ROM Head of Programmes and Public Relations, said the museum was involved in a $42.5 million expansion project which will involve the construction of two wings. A great deal of financial support for the construction and renovations has been provided by Province of Ontario and the Wintario.

This is the first time since 1932 that the ROM has planned such extensive renovations. According to Young, "the plans have been going on for many years," beginning in 1971 with a feasibility report. Since then, there have been additional reports, studies and even province-wide surveys to measure public opinion on the concept of the renovations. Young said the architects have even interviewed the departments of the museum in an effort to find out what their needs will be in the next 25 years. ROM staff members are occupying 30 per cent of the potential gallery space, and with new staff quarters, the space will be freed.

One of the constructions to take place is a planetarium plaza with access to the subway and the main entrance. This month the special student entrance will be opened to divert the dense flow of children from the confusion of the main rotunda. The new area in the lower rotunda is equipped with lockers for the students' use.

There will be a new curatorial centre in the south courtyard, and glass-walled terrace galleries in the north courtyard. An atrium will be built to connect the curatorial centre with the galleries, while maintaining the existing structure.

James E. Cruise, Director of the Royal Ontario Museum, said that "rather than establish branch or satellite museums in other communities, the ROM will encourage and assist the development of local and regional museums that will reflect the needs and heritage of the local communities.

A unique innovation is the "Discovery Room," in the lower rotunda, meant to be a visual and tactile experience for visitors.

"The Discovery Room is intended as a place for people of all ages — a place to touch things. The room is for self-directed study, and is not for children under the age of six," said Young.

The room contains a collection of artifacts, contributed by various museum departments, called "stumpers," ranging from a five pound ostrich egg to a whale bone.

There are "Discovery Boxes" such as the "Tooth Box" — filled with the teeth of numerous animals, complete with question and answer cards.

The "Identification Units" are meant for collectors or those with keen interests in specific areas. One kit, for instance, contains 150 butterflies; the task is to identify the different species.

The Discovery Room is intended for people of all ages, according to Young. Written material is provided in English, French, Italian, Chinese, German and Portuguese, with braille plates and cards for the blind.

Young said he hoped the renovations would create a renewed interest in the museum on the part of all people.

Blues hopes hang in the balance

By JEAN BUBBA

It's only the second game of the regular schedule but Blues' hopes for a championship to cap off Varsity's football centennial celebrations depend to no small degree on the result of tomorrow's game at Varsity Stadium against the always tough Wilfrid Laurier Golden Hawks.

Both teams are coming off relatively easy victories in the opening games last week — Blues handled Waterloo Warriors 37-11 and Hawks polished off York Yeomen 17-1. One interesting note is that in both games the losing teams scored a single point on the opening kickoff, but didn't seriously threaten thereafter.

The winner of tomorrow's game is assured of a tie for first place in the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference western division standings. However, in the long range view, the winner would also gain the home field advantage should the two teams meet again in the playoffs.

Of course, Blues' coaches and returning players know only too well that the home field doesn't always work out to your advantage, as Hawks upset Varsity's title hopes last year with a 23-22 playoff victory. As expected, Blues are out to gain some satisfaction for that untimely result.

Both teams feature experienced coaching and an explosive offensive strategy based on solid running and opportunistic passing.

Varsity's Ron Murphy, now in his twelfth season as head coach, has compiled a record of 58 victories, against only 23 losses in league play, thus making him the winningest coach in U of T football history. In the past three seasons, his teams have won 23 of 28 games and earned a share of the Yates Cup with Western in 1974.

Varsity Blues' John Goodrow

Laurier's Dave "Tuffy" Knight ranks as probably the most colorful, talkative coach in the league, but beneath all the bluster and showmanship is a clever football mind whose teams have appeared in three national finals, albeit on the losing side. Knight is seeking his 100th career victory Saturday and it's safe to assume that the Golden Hawks would dearly like to make it a reality at Blues expense.

In addition to the battle of wits between the coaches, the game should feature a fantastic on the field battle involving the league's two premier running backs — Varsity's John Goodrow and Laurier's Jim Reid.

Goodrow, a third year Physical and Health Education student in his second year of intercollegiate football, saw regular duty for only a part of the 1976 schedule but still managed to gain 383 yards in 60 carries for a most respectable 6.4 yards-per-carry average. Last week the 19-year-old graduate of Royal York Collegiate picked up where he had left off by ploughing through Waterloo for a phenomenal 145 yards in 27 carries.

Fortunately for Blues' game plan, Goodrow won't have to shoulder the entire rushing load, as veteran Bob Hedges has recovered from the bruised ribs that knocked him out of the last game and should be ready for a starting assignment. Hedges, best known for his crunching blocking, was a pleasant surprise last week, as he ran for 74 yards and scored one of Blues five touchdowns. Varsity's other halfbacks are expected to be rookies Frank Raponi (2 TDs last week) and Tobin Doty.

On the other side of the line is Laurier's Jim Reid, who's already got the kind of football credentials that should make him a first-round CFL draft choice when he graduates in 1980. In 1976, Reid rushed for 538 yards to finish only 12 yards behind league leader Mark Braganzolo, the U of T product now with the Argos. However, Reid's performance was sufficiently impressive to earn him rookie-of-the-year accolades at both the OUAA and national CIAU level.

As with Blues, the Golden Hawks had to fill some spots in the offensive backfield and have added Phil Colwell and Larry Sturino to assist Reid.

Both teams also feature new quarterbacks from those who finished the 1976 season. Blues, of course, have Dan Feraday and Joe Hawco, who combined to complete 12 of 18 passes for 164 against Waterloo. Feraday played most of the game in what was his first regular starting assignment, and demonstrated an uncanny ability to effectively mix Blues running and passing. Hawco came in late in the fourth quarter and promptly fired a touchdown pass to freshman Dan Dominico.

Knight is going with Paul Nelson, backed up by Les Protopoulos, who guided Victoria College to the Mulcock Cup championship last year in U of T's intramural league.

Knight has described 1977 as a rebuilding year at Laurier, and many of his new players appear to be in the defensive unit, which has the unenviable task of stopping Varsity's veteran offensive line, which produced almost 440 yards of total offence against Waterloo.

Centre Paul McMillan, guards

Mike Steele and Simon Lee, and tackles Tim Allan and Mike Sokovnin will all start. Veteran tight end Sim Sinopoli, who missed the first game due to an injury, may be ready this time but in any case Brian Hummel is a more than adequate replacement, based on his solid play to date.

Two solid teams and two experienced head coaches. Add lots of cheering fans and the sum should be an exciting afternoon of college football.

BLUENOTES—Western Mustangs, already conceded first place in most of the pre-season polls, should be the other team tied for top spot after tomorrow's games as they play host to York; in the other matches, Windsor (Blues' opponents on Oct. 1) travel to Waterloo and McMaster (whom Blues play next weekend) visits Guelph... in an effort to add some color to the stands, Blues are sponsoring their first annual poster contest, featuring two $30 prizes to the makers of the biggest and best posters or banners on display in the stands tomorrow; the prizes will be awarded at half-time and the banners or posters must be displayed so that they can be seen from Blues' bench.

High hopes for another good year

By BETTY COOK

The women's field hockey team is starting up again in preparation for an extra long season. The team's 26th spot should be filled up in about two weeks although prospective players are still being accepted until the end of this week. Then the Senior team will start its journey to the final, hoping to match its record of last year.

U of T, however, has two field hockey teams. One, the Senior (A) team and the other the (B) intermediate team. The B team also won last year.

With this record, the teams have a lot to live up to but it looks as though they have quite a good chance this year.

On the low side, the two most noticeable losses were Terry Knight, a halfback, and fullback Penny Redman. Both these players have graduated and both were on the Ontario team at the Canada games.

But players like Carol MacDougall, Donna Allaby and Kathy Brown, as well as regular goalie Lynn Halliday and several others like winger Ann Hoffman, Jean Gourley and LuAnn Mailing are back. So it is safe to assume that the team has not gotten a lot weaker.

Coaches Liz Hoffman and Jane Wilton both are logically optimistic about the season with Wilton saying, "I'm looking forward to it."

The A and B teams will be travelling together this year as usual for the series of tournaments which make up their season. Two special matches have also been arranged against Western Michigan and Michigan. Another invitational match is scheduled against Dalhousie, the team which defeated the Blues for the national title last year. The game against Dalhousie, as well as two tournaments, will be held in Toronto while the rest are scheduled away.

See the next issue of the Varsity for a complete schedule.

It's a Blues Poster Contest

While you're picking up books and courses this week, pick up a paintbrush or a felt pen and enter the first annual Varsity Blues Booster Sign Contest. You could win $30.00 at the next Varsity football game on September 17.

Bring it to the stadium before 2 p.m. on Saturday and put it up anywhere in the stadium as long as it is visible from the Blues bench.

Prize money will be awarded at half time to the maker(s) of the two booster signs judged most worthy by the Blues on the basis of size and originality.

Get high on science fiction at Spaced-Out Library

By KATHRYN DEAN

Question: What do Hal 2000, Captain Nemo and Michael Valentine have in common? Answer: They're all found in well-thumbed volumes housed in the Spaced-Out Library at 40 St. George Street.

The Spaced-Out Library is devoted entirely to fantasy and science fiction literature and contains more than 13,000 items — novels and short stories, plays and poetry, critical works, speculative non-fiction, art and tapes.

The library, part of the Toronto Public Library system, has a special appeal to bookworms. Three flights of stairs lead to a cosy, well-lit room filled with plants and a wide range of sci-fi and fantasy literature for the interested browser, the devoted fan, the "serious reader", and the researcher.

Librarians Doris Mehegan and

David Aylward help the browsers with the wealth of material available. Mehegan, who put the collection in order five years ago, now heads the operation. Aylward, formerly of UC's Laidlaw Library, has been reading science fiction since he was 15, has written articles on the subject himself and has an extensive private collection of his own.

More than 200 people frequent the library every month, according to Mehegan. Many visitors are U of T students taking Peter Fitting's "The Science Fiction Novel" course at New College. Students from York University frequent the library too, as it's the largest catalogued collection of fantasy and sci-fi literature in North America and the only such collection in Toronto.

Mehegan is constantly buying new books from wholesale specialists. The main section of the library contains novels (fantasy and sci-fi interspersed). In the cabinets beside the main desk are magazines and academic publications — Foundation, Extrapolation and Scientific American.

In the section entitled "Weird Fiction" are books on some of the more exotic sexual deviations side by side with the first French edition of Jules Verne's works. There are collections of pulp magazines containing novels in serial form dating back to 1940, as well as esoterica like the Worm Runners' Digest.

Science fiction writer Theodore Sturgeon has said that "90 percent of sci-fi is crud, but in that other 10 percent lies some valuable literature." The Spaced-Out Library claims to be the only place where you can do extensive serious research about that important 10 percent. Its mass of biographical and critical material is used by researchers from both Canada and the USA and the library is in the vanguard of sci-fi and fantasy cataloguing.

A preview of the new Canadian Opera Company season, starting on page 14.

Also, local jazz, page 13; a music quiz, page 26; some self-indulgence, page 27; and, of course, WATSUP, page 28.

Culture marches on, even during the summer, and will continue to trample our sensibilities. See our Lookback and Ahead feature on pages 18 through 23.

Lotfi's debut-party: drunks, latecomers & oh yes, opera

It was a combination of the coming-out party, a mass drunk, a near-suicide, and the first flaming of a love affair. This had little to do with the opera, that I seemed to be watching all alone in the O'Keefe Centre Wednesday night.

There's something to be said for going to review something alone. At such times, a critic may feel like a self-righteous voyeur.

So even if this is the season that the Canadian Opera Company reaches out to the masses, Wednesday night was a well-dressed affair. The arrivals were spotted, complete with Brian Linehan, to make the decos feel at home among all the subscribers, whose minks smelled of mothballs.

And they kept arriving. Right through the first act. Some staggering. Perhaps they thought this was a party; they obviously forgot that there's nothing elegant about falling down a dark aisle because of high heels, or tripping over people who just might be more interested in the Marquis de Posa than a Givenchy suit that's invisible.

But the ultimate irony was my seating choice - although it probably doesn't matter to those of you who think that a rush seat, even at $5, is the beggar's alternative. Maybe I won't tell anyone that the back row is the only place in the O'Keefe Centre with acoustics.

The irony in my seating choice was that I saw the real drama Wednesday night. Standing right behind me, through the show, in what he must have thought was invisible anonymity, was the man on the spot: the new director of the company, Lotfi Mansouri. Actually standing is only the box-office term. He paced. He grimaced. At one point in the show, when I looked he seemed to sense that it wasn't holding their attention that's probably because I wasn't the only one distracted by the unmistakable Kojak look-alike.

Mansouri was understandably nervous, in his coming-out, but was porbably being over-sensitive. Don Carlos is easily the best production of opera that I have ever seen at the O'Keefe Centre. The last ten minutes of the second act when I couldn't help but glance back, to see if he felt the miracle being worked on the rowdy bunch that had entered the theatre, contained more excitement than all of the last season. Perhaps that's because of the intensity. In any case, during those ten minutes, I forget everything in the place; rowdies, Mansouri, even the damned review that I would be writing after the show. If I hadn't had one of the most intense catharses of my life, I would have been unable to write anything about an opera marred by a drunken game of musical chairs.

Mansouri's Don Carlos had something of the spirit of the Paris Opera original that played before audiences accustomed to second act arrivals, to be in time for the ballet. When Giuseppe Verdi wrote the work, he must have realized that they would be suckers for emotional content. There's no ballet in this version, and the ending is changed to suit Schiller's original text, but Mansouri chose the longer version (Don Carlo, or Carlos exists in a number of versions, as a result of Verdi's revisions), restoring the lyrical Fountainebleau scene to the opera.

Mansouri had a few surprises for the audience. They saw a set that suggested powerful realism without being very representational, except for the first scene. The new COC orchestra must have confirmed everybody's doubts about the Toronto Symphony as an opera orchestra. While the TSO has far more playing ability, they never had the kind of intensity heard Wednesday night. Mistakes don't matter when they occur in a strong effort; the TSO used to sound good, but indifferent.

The two key surprises for the audience were really one: the portrayals, in dramatic and vocal terms. Don Carlos requires a cast of uncommon depth, because the hero and heroine are only as strong as their dramatic environment.

The plot is Schiller's, loosely based on history. Philippe II of Spain (the opera is in French, remember) has one son, Don Carlos, who is betrothed to Elisabeth de Valois, daughter of Henri II of France, as a condition of peace between the two countries. The opening scene is the meeting of Elisabeth and Carlos disrupted by the arrival of an envoy, who brings a proposal of marriage from Philippe himself. She accepts, largely because many of her countrymen arrive with the envoy; they too want peace.

The major theme of the work revolves around freedom. The Inquisition controls Spain, Marquis de Posa champions the struggle for freedom of the Flemish, against the Spanish tyranny.

Shaw's new persona

If you were to make a checklist comparing Bernard Shaw, the eminent playwright and philosopher who hated to be 'Georged' in public, with Ian Richardson, associate Artist of the Royal Shakespearean Company, recognized star on Broadway and much acclaimed artistic technician, "I do not consider myself an actor but an artistic technician, it is very important that you should know this," currently appearing at the Shaw Festival, you would probably find a healthy balance below the column marked 'similarities'. Both men can be seen as ambitious perfectionists with frightening determination.

"The only way to have a happy life," Shaw stated, "is to be too busy doing what you like all the time, having no time left for you to consider whether you are happy." If you were to accept the Shavian definition of happiness you would probably agree with me that Ian Richardson, much as Shaw was, is a happy man. Richardson is totally devoted to the theatre. Although married and a father of two sons it became rapidly clear during our conversation that the word 'career' in this professional's life must be spelled with a capital "C". It takes precedent above all else.

"Holidays, nonsense," Richardson exploded dramatically whilst washing off his make up, "Don't need them, don't want them. I want job after job after job and if they don't keep coming I want to know the reason why...When I return to England I shall remove the children back with me and what I will do this time because they have reached a certain age, I will try to put them into an establishment where they will remain, not just be day boys. I want to be even freer to move with my wife."

Shaw's personal creed put into the mouth of his character Don Juan in the dream sequence of Man and Superman, his "pit for philosophers", rings especially true when delivered by Richardson and his immaculate technical and vocal gymnastics: "I tell you that as long as I can conceive of something better than myself I cannot be easy unless I am striving to bring it into existence or clearing the way for it. This is the law of my life." Richardson, like Shaw, is an idealist, a perfectionist. Shaw was a driven man. Richardson follows the same course. Life without an absorbing occupation for both would be hell. Joy, one imagines, consists in forgetting life. These two characters, much like Brecht's Mother Courage, "Do not fear death so much, but rather an inadequate (or perhaps imperfect) life."

My interview with Ian Richardson consisted of three interludes. Interlude one, as prearranged, took place in the actor's dressing room at the Shaw festival prior to a Friday evening performance as an Indian doctor in Shaw's The Millionaire. "It's alright. I've only got my false nose to put on." Interlude two was in the same location but at the conclusion of the performance. I had been asked back during the second act interval because Richardson felt that he had not answered one of my questions completely. Both interludes were immensely enjoyable. Both interludes were crammed with precise gestures, scholarly wit, "As it turned out I might have been sitting in the garden of the Hesperides contemplating my navel...", and painstaking diction. If Richardson mispronounces a word, say "vulnerable" or "prejudices", he will repeat it until the pronunciation satisfies his own meticulous standards. Both interludes were intense. Richardson's right hand would frequently quiver, while his left hand precisely dotted his points until a cigarette was inserted and a restless calm was achieved. The overwhelming exuberance of his nervous energy enraptured me. Richardson is, and no doubt will continue to be a great actor. Ronald Bryden wrote in Maclean's magazine that "Richardson, after Gielgud, is the finest virtuoso speaker in the British theatre." However, as a man he must, I feel, be almost impossible to know. Richardson's persona is as solid as Shaw's. Only on a few fleeting moments did Ian Richardson, the man, break through the persona of Ian Richardson, the great performer, and reveal himself:

Question: The one thing that has struck me going through all these interviews is that you constantly, constantly talk about age, time passing, and appear to have a mental clock in your head. Each time you come back to stating I'm forty or I'm forty-two and must do this now or time's passing and I was wondering if there was that same kind of drive which I saw in Shaw's Jack Tanner?

Answer in two parts:
Part One

Yes, I do have that...I am not ashamed of growing into complete maturity. In fact, to tell you the honest truth I'm looking forward to hitting fifty because I want to play King Lear very badly. No. I'll try to explain to you what it is because it is not easy. About four years ago I had an illness. No three years ago because it coincided with my fortieth birthday. And it was, as I say, a serious illness. And I didn't know when I recovered from the illness whether in fact I would be able to act as I had in the past. I didn't really know whether I would be able to act at all. It turned out not to be true...What in actual fact happened, was I came back with a...sense of humility which is one of the actor's most precious possessions when he's up there on the stage. We talk about the moments where you want to gain something. Now, in order to get those gains, the show-off moments let's say, you have to have your moments of humility as well. Because if you just have gain after gain after gain the audience gets terribly tired of seeing a non-loser but a constant winner. There must be a vulnerability somewhere. And that vulnerability comes through humility. And that was something I had never had before my illness because I had been in such a hurry to become an international name.

Part Two...Some Time Later

While I was ill, lying in a private ward of a hospital, waiting for several diagnostic tests to be finalized my life passed like a kind of kaleidoscope before my eyes. Without even willing myself into a state of recollection, indeed it seemed to be exactly the opposite, recollection impinged itself on me as I lay there, I remembered my earliest struggles, my disappointments. They were more vivid to me than my successes...My successes are something which are not as vivid...I suppose because the illness coincided with my reaching a mature age...I suddenly realized that I had devoted the best years of my life insofar as energy and youth are concerned to playing Shakespeare. I had broken my back in Shakespeare's service...When I found my illness was a passing thing I suddenly made a complete turnabout. I became impatient...Instead of thinking about the past, the failures and the glory, I began thinking about the things I had not done. There were areas of the profession that needed my exploration. Films, Television, a musical, a pantomime, an open air theatre, a studio performance, a recording, submitting myself to a question and answers seminar, meeting my audience, exposing myself for what I am instead of just taking my bow at the end of the performance, removing the artifice and creeping out of the stage door into the night...I pushed myself harder.

The Varsity — Robert C. Ragsdale

Ian Richardson's description of his period of male menopause, although interrupted with various theatrical notes and anecdotes, "I'm going to digress for just a moment again...I'm getting off the point," remains the most memorable part of our conversation. Although I found his brilliant interpretation of Claudius challenging, "I see Claudius as a magnificent diplomat, a man who is very shrewd and ambitious. I think it is not just the tragedy of Hamlet but the tragedy of a murderer. You should see him at his peak and you should see, from the end of the play scene, the gradual disintegration of a great mind and a potentially great man who is capable of saying: 'Madness in great tones must not unwatched go.' " And his witty tale about driving a London taxi amusing, I remembered Richardson's moments of humility exuding pain. Words did not flow so easily. Pat answers were not available at the snap of his articulate fingers. Richardson, the product of a strict Scottish upbringing, "Presbyterian to boot," provided for me the answer to Colette's dictum from "The Lady of Letters" enclosed in volume entitled Earthly Paradise: "Humility has its origin in an awareness of unworthiness and sometimes too in a dazzled awareness of 'saintliness.'"

Suddenly, the minor composites of the actor's actor, "I cannot really return to England, having made considerable success in Canada and America, for the sole purpose of taking over a role in a play, albeit a successful play, which has already been established in the West End and opened to the critics," could be forgotten because the man had a great deal more to offer. "When you are acting you may have to give away your most precious possession. Maybe in your marriage you have had to give away a stillborn child. You call upon that as the fundamental stuff from which to do it...I call upon those experiences in my life to fill out the emotional motif of what I want to play." Ian Richardson is a great actor because he can find a man's heart.

Interlude Three: As I was walking across the road to the Shaw Festival theatre the afternoon after my interview a yellow car pulled up to the crossing and a hand came out beckoning me forward. "When I used the word alliteration in reference to Jack Tanner and Berowne I meant adjectives. So keep me right." Ian Richardson: A sincere perfectionist to the end.

Murphy needs backup

Do cults reflect talent? Do they ever?

"It's no fun being a cult figure."
Lou Reed

That's especially true when all you really want to be is a rock superstar. Elliott Murphy played to no more than 50 people, over two nights early this week, at the El Mocambo tavern. His music seems to be aiming itself towards a very wide audience but somehow manages to miss.

He's not lacking popularity because of his music's complexity: it's about as simple a pop rock sound as you can find. And he's not trying to reach over the head of the masses with his lyrics: they're a combination of Bruce Springsteen and Dan Hill, and they miss by a mile.

We'll hit the coast in a T-bird named Teenage

We're heading out for a psychologically clean age.

Now that's silly.

He tries to walk that tightrope between generating emotional responses, and stimulating intellectual reflection. By trying this moderate approach, one cannot devote one's full energies to either one or the other. Only the very best can do both; Murphy isn't one of them.

At the El Mocambo he came alone, and played acoustic sets. In April of this year, he opened for the Kinks at Maple Leaf Gardens, and had a full rock'n'roll band with him. The reason for the amputation is basically financial, and considering that good musicians don't usually come cheap, it's better to come alone.

But in a solo effort, your lyrics acquire a greater prominence, and like most folkies and folk-rockers, Murphy's lyricism translates into banality.

There were moments, and there were lines, but they were all too few.

Steve Petranik

All alone on stage, Murphy tries to generate some energy. He falls.

Blues has Progressive by the balls

rush

It's always sad when a no-nonsense, hard rock band tries to become something more important. In a vain attempt to become progressive artists they inevitably end up stuck half-way between their old roots and their inaccessible goal. That is just what has happened to Rush.

Once upon a time, Rush were a slightly better than average bar band happily plugging away on the Yonge St. circuit. Then, thanks to a couple of run-of-the-mill albums and some clever publicity in the States, these boys found themselves heavy metal superstars. In an attempt to justify this heady glory, they have thrown out boogie riffs and become progressive rockers. A Farewell to Kings, their latest effort, is their most heavy-handed attempt at this genre.

This album is loosely based in a medieval-fantasy world. Neil Peart's humourless lyrics cry vaguely for a lost past in which life was simpler, ideals nobler, a world in which rich princes lavished their wealth on the poor, evil kings were dethroned and philosophers and blacksmiths worked for the common good of man. God help us.

This romantic dribble is backed by thoroughly forgettable melodies and a hodge-podge of pseudo-classical and rock instrumentation. Only in few brief moments, such as the guitar solo in "Cinderella Man", is any semblance of rock and roll approached. And to make matters worse, the last song on this disc, called "Cygnus X-1", is about flying a space-ship into a black hole in space (the connection to the middle ages is, of course, obvious). This charming ditty is followed in the lyric sheet by an extremely ominous "to be continued..." Let's hope not.

The frustrating thing about all this is that the members of Rush are not total musical incompetents. They have ability and even a smattering of talent. But they are not a three man Yes and the sooner they figure that out the better. For all of us.

Paul Budra

yes

The basic premise behind progressive rock music is that it explores areas which are taboo within the context of rock'n'roll. However, it always remains rock music because it remains firmly rooted in that same past, however the influences have been transformed.

The Europeans are the major innovators in this field (Canadians and Americans more readily move into the field of jazz if they are interested in experimenting with popular musical forms). There are many of these bands which claim to be progressive and only a very tiny minority succeed. Yes have been one of the success stories, merging both innovation and accessibility. One of the reasons they do succeed is that each member of the five-man band is extremely competent as a performer, and as a team they can carry a complex musical load.

On their newest album, Going for the One, they move into pieces of shorter length than has been their norm on recent works. But they have maintained their interest in complex rhythmic developments, overlaid with often grandiose yet smooth melody lines.

Unfortunately, progressive music has been around long enough to develop its own musical cliches, and Yes are repeating them already. Especially guilty of this crime is lead singer Jon Anderson and his song, "Wonderous Stories", which is merely another magical mush bomb, of the type he has done so often before and which can now write while mowing the lawn.

The highlight of the album, as always, is the bass playing of Chris Squire, a musician who can maintain both the urgency of basic rock and the intelligence and wit of something much more. It is that type of playing which makes progressive rock and Yes in particular, an interesting musical meal.

Steve Petrank

This is the album that every true Johnny Winter fan has been waiting for. The album he's been promising to make for years. An album strictly of blues.

It's strange that Mr. Winter has waited so long to bring out this work. He did begin his solo career as a blues artist and he has been friends with the legendary Muddy Waters from his earliest days. It seems that he was side-tracked into the rock and roll genre and has never had the time to escape the label "rock star". The success of his last album, Captured Live may have given him the breathing space to get together with Waters and company to bring out the

So now we have Nothin' But the Blues. An album featuring eight original Winter's tunes, a guest appearance by Muddy Waters, the harmonica work of James Cotton and some of the nicest guitar work that Winter has done in a long while.

The songs vary in tenor from the down-home country honk of "TV Mama" to the sophisticated despondency of "Everybody's Blues". Winter plays electric and acoustic guitar, both with less frenzy, but much more grace, than he has on his last few rock albums. Muddy Waters and Winter swap vocals on a live take of the album's only non-Winter tune, "Walking Thru the Park", displaying nicely the affinity between these two gentlemen's styles.

Whether Winter will continue in the blues vein or return to rock is anybody's guess. He has, however, been promising to bring out an album of country music. One can only hope that it will have the class and assurance of "Nothin' But the Blues".

Klotz plots lotza hot spotz

Most of you realize that Toronto is growing as a jazz centre. This article should give you some idea of what jazz is available in the city and where you can find it. The list is constantly in flux, with frequent additions of new clubs and occasional unfortunate deletions. Hopefully, we'll be keeping you abreast of these throughout the year.

Bourbon St. at 180 Queen St. W., heads off the list of jazz clubs. Although one of the most expensive spots in town, it features a consistently high quality of American big-name jazz artists, backed up usually by local rhythm sections. The music tends to date from the swing and be-bop periods, primarily because this attracts diners with hefty billfolds. Such big names as Zoot Sims, Harry Sweets' Edison and Dexter Gordon drop in at least once a year, as well as more modern players such as Gap Mangione and Gerry Niewood. Most gigs now last for two weeks, and run from 9 p.m. - 1 a.m. Monday to Saturday. Bourbon St.'s drawbacks are minimal in comparison with the quality of the music, but they must be mentioned. Dinner prices are steep, although this author has nursed a coffee and 1/2 pizza for four hours and escaped for less than $5. The audience tends to gab, which can be most disturbing when one sits at a back table and attempts to listen to a piano trio. When making reservations (a necessity), ask for a front table. Finally, one can sit in the bar, but partitions reduce the visibility and intensity of the music from there. 598-3020.

George's Spaghettie House, 290 Dundas E. at Sherbourne, is owned and operated by the same man who handles Bourbon St., Ted Cole. The club features lesser known and more contemporary artists, who are primarily Toronto-based. The Mo' Koffman Quintet plays for one week every month; his rhythm section of Ed Bickert, Rick Homme, Marty Morrell and Don Thompson is one of the best around. Prices are not as expensive, and the group is audible and visible from every table. The food is Italian, the place is licenced, and music runs from 9 p.m. - 1 a.m. 923-9887.

One of the newest and most dynamic clubs in town is Yellowfingers, 1280 Bay at Yorkville. Since early 1977 they have instituted a jazz policy which has expanded to a point where three different groups are presented each week. The principle group, usually a quintet, plays nightly Monday through Saturday 9 p.m. - 1 a.m. Mostly Toronto talent is seen, which includes many players with international reputations, and the music runs the entire spectrum of modern jazz short of free form. Dave Caplan, the club's booking agent, has resurrected a gimmick from the 40's that has caught on quite well: the jazz battle, where two artists of the same instrument front a rhythm section and trade solos. Coming is a flute battle between Kathy Moses and Eugene Amaro which should be something special. The rhythm sections here are selected by the leader of the group, and tend to utilize some of the new rising performers as Dave Piltch, bass, Ross Piltch, guitar, and Frank Falco, piano.

Every Friday and Saturday the club presents an after-hours group from 1.30 - 4.00 a.m. Since only devoted jazz fans will attend at those hours, the music tends to be avant garde. In particular, original compositional groups such as Swan Song and the Freddy Stone Sextet can be heard practically nowhere else.

Finally, the Sunday Dinner-Concert features a different quartet each week from 6.30 - 10.30 p.m.

Because of its prime location, and the size of many of the groups, the club charges a $2 cover from Thursday to Saturday. There is also a food and beverage minimum of $2.50 during music hours, reduced to $1.50 from Thursday to Saturday. 964-1984.

Blondie's, 1954 Yonge at Davisville, is an even more recent addition to Toronto jazz. It's booking agent, Andy Krehm, seems to have resolved many of the problems which beset other jazz clubs. The dining room (Canadian food) is upstairs for those who wish to talk while they dine, which will hopefully ease the noise problem. The manager will reserve a table downstairs at music level once the meal is over. The stage is visible from every table in the room, and is situated in the middle rather than at the back. There will be no cover charge for as long as possible, except when big name Americans are invited to play. In general, the club attracts local groups playing modern, listenable jazz. Andy informs me that if the club's success continues, he will attempt to book some of the fine local groups which aren't proven draws. Until then, popular and established players such as Eugene Amaro (sax and flute), Rob McConnell (trombone) and Sam Noto (trumpet) will prevail. In addition, the Andy Krehm Quartet will play regularly. 482-0055.

Another new club which opened up over the summer is BIC's Coffee House, 11 Yorkville. As yet there is only a tentative schedule, but jazz will shortly be featured at least two days each week. George Botley, a guitar graduate from Berkeley, will be forming an organ trio which will back up front line soloists. In order to avoid having to charge a cover, the club will restrict itself, at least at first, to young, lesser-known musicians. George intends BIC's to be a place where new talent can be heard, where people can drop in with a spending a bundle, where the music is exciting without being overly loud. The food is "light, wholesome, healthy and inexpensive" and a liquor licence will hopefully soon be arriving. 923-2943.

Cafe Soho, 334 Queen W. at Spadina, has recently initiated a jazz policy, offering after hours sessions 1.30 - 4.00 a.m. Friday and Saturday nights. I am informed that the music will be modern but not avant garde, presenting local musicians in a trio or quartet format. Coming are Carlton Vaughan and Don Englert among others. The cover is $2, food consists of light snacks, and no booze. 862-0199.

In a class by itself, the Music Gallery, 30 Patrick St., is an important and well-known jazz institution in the city. Much of the jazz that has evolved since 1960 can only get a hearing at the Gallery. It specializes in avant garde improvised music, whether jazz or 'classical', and often features groups with no drawing power whatsoever. Free jazz can alienate the untutored ear, and consequently doesn't pay in the commercial dining-drinking market. Only at the Music Gallery, where musicians will cheerfully outnumber the audience, can this idiom flourish. The Canadian Creative Music Collective (CCMC) performs a collective improvisation every Tuesday and Friday night. The six musicians involved begin each set with no preconceived notion of what each will play, in effect composing the piece as it is being played. Free jazz artist prefer this loose (or non-) structure to allow flexibility to change the musical flow. This freedom can lead them, in a given piece, all the way from traditional Dixieland to total rhythmic and harmonic dissociation.

The Gallery offers open jam sessions every Thursday night from 7-10 p.m. to which even amateurs are invited to attend. 598-2400.

Two spots in town offer free weekly concerts. On Fridays 5-7 p.m. the Eaton Centre presents well-known Toronto groups on Level 3, Trinity (wherever that is!). The series should run all year. Closer to home, the Hart House Music Committee offers jazz every Wednesday afternoon, 12-2 p.m. in the East Common Room, starting Sept. 28. On that date, we'll be treated to a concert by Phil Nimmon'n Nine plus Stix. Richard Liss, the organizer, informs me that the series this year will be the biggest and best ever (since his budget is the biggest and best ever).

For lovers of soft jazz there are at least three spots for dining to a background of beautiful improvisation. The Beggars Banquet, a vegetarian restaurant at 325 Queen

W., hosts a jazz trio on Friday and Saturday nights 8.30 - 12 p.m. and for Sunday brunch 12 - 4 p.m. Instrumentation is usually a guitar, bass and sax or flute.

Cafe May, 396 Roncesvalles, features the Lorne Lofsky Trio every Sunday night 7.30 - 11.00 p.m. Lorne is a fine player, recently graduated from the York University Jazz Program. German cuisine, no licence, and situated right beside the Revue Cinema. 532-9218.

Finally, Joel Shulman entertains on piano every day at lunch hour from noon to 5 p.m. at his Garden Party, 82 Avenue Rd. In addition, and as the main event, every second Sunday he features another prominent local musician in duet. The music is intellectual, being completely improvised and unrehearsed. Entertainment from 8.30 - 11.00 p.m. with a half hour intermission, and reservations are essential. 961-1114.

Mention must be made here of the recent demise of several new clubs. Afficionados have still not yet recuperated from the transformation of Mother Necessity's Jazz Workshop into a men's squash club. L'il Porky's has terminated its jazz policy, as have Gaffer's, the Chelsea Inn and Basin St. except for special occasions. The new locations especially need all the support they can get to enable them to forestall this gruesome fate while continuing to provide good music at reasonable prices.

Hopefully this article has managed to exhaust the list of existing jazz clubs in Toronto. If anyone hears of a new spot, please inform the Varsity. The impending sequel to this article will cover jazz on the radio, where to learn to play jazz, jamming, books, records, etc. In the meantime, take advantage of the music this city has to offer. Enjoy yourselves!

Aggression is the first principle of survival

Twenty-twenty hindsight is about all a critic can count on. After having seen Don Carlos I'll predict that the season of the Canadian Opera Company is a success. This season is obviously as crucial as any in economic times like these. Don't believe that this one is somehow the big make-or-break year. One bad year anytime would do it.

This is the year that will bring relief to the long suffering. No Puccini is on the horizon, the warhorses are in storage for a while, and the company's repertoire is receiving an infusion of works that audiences are not tired of.

Finally the company seems to be moving towards the development of a following, instead of pandering to patrons. If a company does good work, it will have a following; if the work is good, but done with patrons too much in mind (especially the types one might expect in Toronto), they may suddenly boycott the company. The new aggressive approach is safer economically, even in a higher ticket and salary bracket.

The Magic Flute, the next show after Don Carlos, (Sept. 28), is not quite the story that Bergman translated to the cinema. Bergman took a fairly universal allegory that refers specifically to freemasonry, and eliminated the reference. But almost none of the script except for the minor changes belongs to Bergman.

The Magic Flute is a sung play, that is it has dialogue between its numbers (or vice versa, depending on your bias). Like any great comedy, Magic Flute deals with discrimination of true and false wisdom, illusion and reality, and general human folly. Part of this illusion takes in the audience with the hero. The Prince Tamino, while beset by a dragon, is saved by magic ladies who serve the Queen of the Night. Tamino is enlisted to save her daughter from an evil magician who kidnapped her. Naturally, having seen her portrait, Tamino is moved by more than compassion: the daughter, Pamina, will be his wife, if he succeeds on his quest.

But this is not a preposterous fairy tale, even if it is fantasy. We come to find out that the magician is named Sarastro, and rules a kingdom, living in the temple of wisdom. He is a benevolent father figure. The story, as the quest unfolds, begins to take on stronger and stronger overtones of primal imagery. That would be fine for Bergman (who made Sarastro into Pamina's father), but Mozart wrote the opera, and Schikaneder the libretto around 1790.

Were this the only main action of the plot, it would be a heavy comedy indeed. Tamino has a companion on this quest who is an everyman figure to balance, and even to undercut the impetuous prince. This is the Queen's birdcatcher, Papageno, who uses everybody in the opera as a straightman. While he does not have Tamino's strength of purpose in the quest (the Queen told him to go), he receives a reward even though he fails.

Imagine an opera that requires the hero to undergo a trial of silence. Obviously, Papageno is useful. In that he blabs his way through Tamino's trials, until he and Tamino become separated. There may be some virtue in seeing Papageno as a lesson to all of us: if he is too attractive, it indicates how fallen we are. He does appear to be the most popular character in the opera, judging historically . . .

Silence means not having to say you're sorry it's an opera. Non-verbal means orchestral to Mozart, which might be why this work appeals so much to those who usually resist opera. One little sub-theme that the opera pushes, every now and again, is that music is better than words. Few would argue. The magic in the flute is its ability to make men happy, rendering enemies harmless. The flute goes on the final trial with Tamino. Music helps Papageno find his reward, where his big mouth didn't help him.

This work should have a guaranteed audience, based on the frequency of Mozart productions in Toronto, which is low. The National Arts Centre production is being brought to town, but will sport a far more attractive cast. Leo Goeke of the Metropolitan Opera stars as Tamino, with Peter Barcza as Papageno. Together, they may get more of the youth that's supposed to be there. Barcza, incidentally, is twenty-eight, the age given in the text. Patricia Wells as Pamina and Robert Lloyd as Sarastro also star.

The Daughter of the Regiment, the third offering of the season is a joyfully light work that I don't feel qualified to speak of at this moment. The work is more purely for the purpose of virtuosity — of a fun sort — than Magic Flute, for instance. If you like to hear vocal display, this is the work for you. Starring Norma Burrows, Maureen Forrester and William Harness, this is perhaps an apt follow-up to last year's anti-military Grande Duchesse of Gerolstein. Boris Brott will conduct the pleasant surprise from Don Carlos, the new orchestra.

That orchestra will receive its baptism of fire in the final offering of the season, with its architect in the hot seat. Raffi Armenian will certainly know how the orchestra is progressing, and may have to face the music himself. Wozzeck is in other words a big test for singers and orchestra.

Based on Georg Buchner's fragment, in an early reconstruction that misreads the title among other "errors" (since the version is viable, error is a loaded word), Alban Berg's innovative opera has made it difficult for anybody to put on the play with the correct title (Woyzeck).

The play is like a sophisticated version of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, but written in (unbelievably) the 1830's. Its influence was minimal because it was hidden in a family collection of the author's works until the late nineteenth century; and even then it was ahead of its time.

Wozzeck is like McMurphy, that is, sensitive in an insensitive or mad world (depending upon your criteria for sanity). Wozzeck is surrounded by cardboard characters straight out of Commedia dell'Arte. He is too sensitive to take it. The political implications of this play are obvious, considering that it uses the majority as a definition of sanity, and adds an oppressive doctor, who feeds Wozzeck peas, for his theories to grow (certainly not Wozzeck's mind), to complete the pathetic picture. Wozzeck kills his wife, who has been unfaithful, in his madness. The whole action is made to be the product of social determinism, and not any individual free will.

Wozzeck and his wife carry the opera between them. Allan Monk, seen on TV in La Boheme stars as Wozzeck, while Lyn Vernon, last year's Fricka, and the Herodias of two years ago, plays Marie. Both are strong dramatically. Interestingly, Wozzeck is almost all-Canadian in its cast, including the two leads mentioned above.

Leo Barcza

Jenny Lind as Marie in Daughter of the Regiment; this is not an army recruiting poster.

Everybody expects the Spanish Inquisition

Carlos demonstrates in his frustration with his step-mother how not to be a reformer: angry with his father's tyranny (double for him), he pronounces himself a defender of Flemish freedom, and thus a traitor and heretic. But I won't spoil it any more for you.

Ermanno Mauro, as the impetuous Carlos, enjoyed (for the first time in a few years) the luxury of having other people in the show to carry the load. His heroics were vocal, although he coped dramatically, but largely because Carlos comments more than does anything in this opera. The first time we see him (alone) might epitomize his soliloquizing loneliness.

Clarice Carson, as Elisabeth was vocally successful, but upstaged repeatedly by others. This is the nature of the role, with rewarding singing, but nothing for would-be Sarah Bernhards.

The two most memorable portrayals of the young season were in the two meaty roles. Philippe is a power figure who is humiliated by the Grand Inquisitor, and by his wife's unfaithfulness. Interestingly enough he is merely annoyed by the Flemish, or his son's treason, but is very moved by the integrity of de Posa. Paul Plishka played this character to its Shakespearean depths, even if they do not begin to show until the last act, when his dignity is stripped. There was nothing excessive here, yet there was passion below the surface that only exploded in crisis. The voice contains many possible intensities, and Plishka used them all purposefully.

The Princesse d'Eboli, who betrays Carlos

when spurned by him, is a very theatrical part. It requires physical beauty, subtlety, and then pure raw energy, to go with the awesome demands the part makes on the singing voice.

Tatiana Troyanos succeeded in making Eboli sympathetic while angry, without soft-pedalling any fury. The toughest part of the role is her noble resolution to save Carlos: and Troyanos makes it noble, and not mere energy and good singing.

The only weak spot in the cast is Rodriguez, Victor Braun. His role is virtually a Christ figure; for two acts, Braun made Rodriguez more than the usual too-good-to-be-true idealist. His voice has lost much of the beauty it used to have, although his technique seems to be pulling him through tough spots. The rougher sound is an asset in this role - the part is usually beautifully sung - until the scene of his death, when a sort of transfiguration should occur. Braun's acting made the scene work, but musically, in one of the most melodic sections of the whole work, I was disappointed (false expectations?).

Worthy of mention is the Grand Inquisitor of Don Garrard. While the part is small, it is haunting no matter who plays it because of the all-pervading presence of the Inquisition in the story, and the music. When he finally shows up in the final act, for the interview with Philippe, he is a paradoxical combination of frailty and strength; blind, and old but able to command the king. Garrard doesn't mess with the overwhelming presence that the first two acts lend him. He plays it conservative, and makes the role work; it can't be done any other way.

The final tableau tells the whole story: a series of calls in front of the curtain, for the soloists, while the audience does the Toronto standing ovation, with one arm inside the coat before the show is over. The applause was flagging; Mauro didn't get the applause he deserved, perhaps because the audience didn't feel like keeping the ovation going that long. And then, Mansouri came out to take part in a bow, and there was a roar of bravos.

Don Garrard (Le Grand Inquisiteur), by the time he enters in the last act, is an expected guest.

Indian Antiquities

The Indians of North America were not one people but many different people with varying languages, and culture groups which were further subdivided into tribes and nations.

However there were some similarities in their culture. Although archaeologists have found no evidence of use of pottery among Canadian Indians, their heritage is rich in the art of basketry.

For the Indian people, basketry was not a craft or a pastime but done by mature and talented Indian women to fill the needs of their people. No matter how great the number made, each was lovingly and individually crafted.

Great labour, patience and innumerable hours were needed to prepare the roots, stems and other parts of the plants and then to fashion the material as needed.

Because they were made of vegetable matter, baskets did not last unless kept in a dry condition. Some did survive for over two centuries, and a rare collection of 80 such domestic and ritual Canadian Indian antiquities is presently on exhibit at the Aggregation Gallery on Front St.

This collection is unusual in that it contains a large number of works by a group that is virtually ignored in museums, the Sabish Indians who lived on the Canadian plateau. The pieces date from 1790 to 1920.

Sabish basketry is striking and easily recognized because of its bold colourful designs that contrast sharply with their background.

Indian baskets in some cases were so sturdily woven, that some were used for cooking by throwing hot stones into them to boil water. One such basket dating from around 1850 blackened by fire and with desiccated food particles forms a part of the Aggregation Gallery exhibit.

By comparison, the work of the Canadian Northwest coast Tlingit Indians shows a much smaller design, more delicate and finer weaving and more elaborate decorations.

All the designs used on Indian objects have a meaning that was understood by the Indians and usually referred to animals, plants or people.

A basket could have more than one design and some baskets tell a whole story.

The butterfly design is obvious to us in its meaning. The design representing a fly is more representational and made of the four points at the corners of a square and a fifth point in the middle. Some designs are completely symbolic and their meaning unknown to us.

After the roots, stems, blades of grass or other materials chosen were gathered, the material to form the main structure of the basket was dyed a muted color. Then the other strands that would form the design were dyed in brighter colors such as red by using the wild cherry spruce root and black using the inner bark of cedar.

In addition to a rich variety of baskets, the Aggregation Gallery collection includes exquisitely detailed quillwork by the Mic Mac Indians from the Canadian Eastern Woodlands, carved totem poles, masks, rattles and boxes from the Canadian Woodland Cree and Ojibway Indians, and some spoons. Each in the small group of spoons is superbly detailed and carved from horns.

The Aggregation Gallery which has been in operation for nine years has until now specialized in contemporary Canadian and Canadian Indian art, notably the work of Carl Ray, Josh Kakegamic and his brother Goyce Kakegamic which depicts the heritage, legends and life of the Cree.

This is its first venture into antiquities. For this exhibit, special sculpture stands were made with good success although the upper section of the stands is somewhat cloudy. The spoons are particularly well set up for viewing. The usual pretentious use of lights has been avoided and a catalogue is presented free of charge to the visitors.

LOOK BACK AND AHEAD

In what is rapidly becoming a tradition in this city, Pink Floyd did not play Toronto again this summer.

Instead we were blessed, during the hey-day of last year's exams, with one of those all too rare visits from the Kinks. Following fast on their footsteps came the ever enigmatic Bryan Ferry and company (no, not Roxy Music, but pretty close to it). And that was about it for big name excitement this summer.

Big name boredom, on the other hand, abounded during the muggy months. The C.N.E. started off the season with the sizzling energy and gut rock power of Fleetwood Mac and Boz Scaggs. Moving quickly, the long awaited E.L.P. took over the grandstand with some "40 tons of space". Nice try, but they're no Kiss. E.L.P., having lost their orchestra on tour and the bulk of their musical sense on their last album, proved the disappointment of the summer months.

Next came Toronto's yearly visit from the Beach Boys; thrills galore from the land of California Sun. Some bands last too long. Kansas slipped in there somewhere, carefully so as not to wake anyone up, and the Rollers arrived in town amidst a flurry of screams and tartin. Don't laugh, both Goddard and Penfield acclaimed the concert. Teeny-bobber sensations have an embarrassing way of slipping into the more reputable market as time goes by.

In the outside world, Led Zeppelin caused massive riots at ticket agencies during their North American tour. The tour was cut short, unfortunately, by the death of Robert Plant's son. The drawing power of Zep is amazing considering the sorry fate of their live album. Some legends refuse to die. Pink Floyd invaded Olympic stadium in Montreal with an entourage of inflatable animals and crazy diamonds. Cute stuff, but again, they're no Kiss. Rick Wakeman, swamped by plastic dinosaurs and bills, re-joined Yes and toured fairly successfully with them through the States and a sizable piece of Europe.

The real excitement of the summer months came from within the city itself. Specifically it emanated from a re-converted warehouse basement on a dingy back-street deep within the bowels of Ed's village; the Crash'n'Burn. Opened and operated, during its all too brief life span, by the Diodes, it played host to Toronto's increasingly important punk rock bands. This was all the Toronto bands needed for Teenage Head has since become the favorite underground band in the city, the Diodes have signed with Columbia and the Viletones have released two 45s. Toronto punk is also gaining a name in New York, what with the three aforementioned bands' gig at CBGB's.

In the punk line, the legendary Ramones and the Dead Boys laid seige to the New Yorker early in July. The assault was so effective that the Dead Boys were invited back to the Crash'n'Burn as headliners. The ensuing bun fight (rolls and kaisers stolen from Ed's warehouse provided the ammunition) will go down in New Wave history as one of its crowning absurdities.

The future, in the punk scene, includes a huge party at the Masonic Temple tomorrow night, which will include almost every underground band in this city in its line-up. Tonight, at the New Yorker, the new, improved Talking Heads will be making its return. There's no telling what that will be like. For regular, club punk, David's is now the New Wave emporium in town. A re-converted disco it doesn't have the charm of the old Crash'n'Burn, but it does have chairs.

In terms of big names, the upcoming season looks very promising. Check the Watsup column. The only thing we can do now is cross our fingers and hope that Kiss decides to tour. Good times.

Beethoven & Belles Lettres

Although not quite dead in the summer, the Toronto music scene certainly comes alive in the fall.

The Canadian Opera Company's fall season is the real beginning. After last year's season of consolidation, they are embarking upon a new era under Lotfi Mansouri, this being the first season that really reflects his influence. While hitting the heights musically, and in terms of seat-prices, the key change this year is the aggressive choice of works. They are not the warhorses of bygone years, and, with one exception — in our other official language — are in English. The company also sports a new orchestra, which is finally its own.

Having ended its collaboration with the opera company, the Toronto Symphony appears to be celebrating by having a Beethoven Festival, even if this is also the sesquicentennial of Beethoven's death. Perhaps the September-festival concept will become a regular feature on the Toronto music scene.

Three days after the last note of Beethoven's Ninth, the Symphony starts its regular season on Oct. 18. The subscribers continue their near-stranglehold on Massey Hall. Featured this year are Lorin Maazel with the Cleveland Orchestra (the TSO, incidentally won't be on stage at the same time), Pinchas Zukerman, Paul Plishka and Václav Neumann.

If you're a typically poor music-loving student, chances are that the Faculty of Music and Hart House provide most of your live concert experience. Ranging from quality performances by students in free recitals to appearances by stars from abroad at astoundingly reasonable prices, the Edward Johnson Building offers bargains all-round. Among the highlights are performances by the Orford Quartet, Russian sprano Galina Vishnevskaya, a special "Celebration of the Queen's 25th Jubilee" in words and music, on Oct. 2, and the two fully mounted operas from the opera department, Britten's Albert Herring and Mozart's Don Giovanni.

In the same vein, Music Gallery offers "innovative and experimental works of music and dance" (their words). Among the highlights they offer will be a lecture by John Cage on Oct. 1.

The other major regular contributor to the local music scene comes in the packages offered by Toronto Arts Productions, through the St. Lawrence Centre. Last year they offered a number of series with different foci, suggesting awareness that series are best when the buyer likes every concert, not just some: for example, "Piano eight", or "Canadian Performers", a series that offered young Canadians the exposure they need in this country. This year "Music Canada" is not a renamed Canadian Performers, but a collection of Canadian offerings in operatic, choral and chamber music.

This seems to be the year of the festival in Toronto. Toronto Arts is giving Brahms the same sort of treatment Beethoven received at the hands of the Symphony, but with a greater emphasis on chamber music, Oct. 13-28. From the box-office response, Brahms seems to be in demand. There will be a Mozart Festival (who needs the excuse of a sesquicentennial?) from Oct. 1-Apr. 8, with six concerts that we know next to nothing about as yet; call 964-1575 for info. A 10-show festival at the Victoria Playhouse Petrolia (882-1121) will feature such performers as Liona Boyd, Canadian Brass, Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn, beginning Sept. 30th.

LOOKBACK AND AHEAD

The first book your correspondent reviewed for the Varsity the year last past, was a swine flu bug of rare price, Billy Graham's Angels: God's Secret Agents. This and the Reverend Norman Vincent Peale's Positive Thinking For a Time Like This, ended my religious preoccupations for the year, and I have since made the pages in which these reviews appeared into rival Bishops in my chess set of papier-mache pieces (lightweight but durable).

This year it seems Graham has a new book on the shelves of certain elect bookstores, although nothing from Peale as yet. (What a tragedy, the loss to the world not so long ago of his Positive Thinking for the Vietnam Vet, burnt in a fire in the good Dr.'s house while yet in manuscript pages!) The most Rev. Graham's book gives his step-by-step, easy to follow plan for salvation.

But I doubt if I'll be reviewing Graham this year — there is Voltaire's principle to remember here; once a philosopher, twice a pervert.

Last year saw the publication of a first novel by Canada's finest poet, Michael Ondaatje's Coming Through Slaughter, which I reviewed. This school year I expect to review the third novel of Canada's most distinguished novelist in English, Sylvia Fraser's Fairy Tale, due in February.

Last year Norman Mailer published his extraordinary anthology-study of the works of Henry Miller, Genius and Lust, a Journey through the major writings of Henry Miller. To tell you the truth, I give myself bad points for that review; one or two of the points I made were interesting, and I certainly think I had more to say than was valid than any of the conventional journals in their patronizing evaluations. Reader, I confess, I pulled a Fasbinder in my review of Mailer last year, which had the stunning title The Superhighway of the Fuck: Mailer on Henry Miller — and resolutely failed to live up to that title on each and every last count. Appypolly-logies all around. It seems my creative energies were devoted more to the title than to the article proper.

Maybe the biggest publishing events of this present year and one I intend to give a notice on if from MacMillan I receive at all my reviewer-copy, is The Public Burning by Robert Coover. (The unofficial full-length title is The Public Burning of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg: an historical romance.) Robert Coover is probably the best satirical writer in America today.

This year in my capacity as literary editor I will be encouraging other reviewers to try their hands just as anarchistically as they please either at serious analyses of serious books, or satirical analyses of pop culture works. (For instance any reviewer with a zest to kill is welcome to a shot at the new Billy Graham.) Under the literary banner will also appear the occasional poetry to which contributions are most trepidatiously invited — I know undergraduate poetry rather too well.

Last year I consumed a great many watermelon and bananas; this year I expect to do the same, although I may opt for a more fulsome ration of cherries in their season.

Here, There & Back Again

Looking backwards to last year's theatre season is not, like the previous year's ruminations, a time for despair — entirely. A growing commercialism has shown itself in the Tier 2 theatres of the city, which are making themselves an essential part of the city's cultural life.

Lobbying for land became fashionable as Toronto Workshop Productions secured their old building through pressure tactics. New Theatre, along with two others, arranged for a move to the Adelaide Court site. The Factory Lab promises to improve their premises. Some of the increase in visibility was due, simply, to hoopla — as in the case of the Race for the Arts society scam.

The Phoenix Theatre packed in audiences with The Seal, and it was matter for debate whether it was Edward Bond's script or the acting which accounted for its success. Open Circle Theatre had a marvellous success with The Primary English Class but seems to have shelved less commercial material like Moby Dick.

It was a banner season for Philips (excuse us, Stratford — we're fine — Robin's-a-genius continues unabated and empire-building progresses well also). Why has there been so much fuss about Margaret Tyzack and Maggie Smith in Richard III when Brian Bedford is the heart and soul of the play? A proposed videotape of this superlative production was blocked by ACTRA, which resents foreign actors holding positions Canadians can fill. Forty-three positions in this cast were held by Canadians, and the other three could not have been replaced by Canadian actors, but the point was made for the benefit of the CBC, whose hide-bound hiring practices ACTRA is in fact moving against. Stratford itself is moving towards a three-year contract for about fifty actors which will lead to a strong ensemble and an ever greater sense of identity for the talent Philips has gathered around him.

This season will have its delights and its peculiarities for local audiences. Some of our most eagerly anticipated events: Mother Courage at the Toronto Arts Productions (St. Lawrence) continues Leon Major's avowed intent to perform all of Bertold Brecht's work. At last, Winter Offensive will appear at the Factory Theatre Lab. Rehearsals ended last spring after members of the cast (it is rumoured) declined to perform some of the sexual acts called for in this play concerning Nazi debauchery one war-time Christmas. At 95 Danforth Street a new company, Mime Unlimited, has taken up residence. They will be giving classes and workshops in addition to providing theatre space for mime performances. The city seems to be taking mime more seriously.

Toronto Free Theatre opens its season with Carol Bolt's Desperadoes. Bolt is one of Canada's most frequently produced playwrights and is fresh from the successful run of One Night Stand. Theatre Compact, acting in conjunction with the Canadian Opera Company, is presenting an adaptation of Georg Buchner's Woyzeck. If you are not madly in love with German Expressionist theatre, you might be induced to take it in if only to see Linda Thorson, who, with James Edmond, heads the cast. Miss Thorson was, of course, Tara King, the voluptuous sidekick of Steed in many episodes of The Avengers.

LOOKBACK AND AHEAD

In retrospect we may label this as the summer when movies died in Toronto. On Friday nights the queues still snake round the block. The city's per capita film attendance continues to lead the continent. The cognoscenti, however, have moved on to other interests. Those who know and who are known are placing their bets on other art forms. When you enter one of the repertory houses familiar faces still dot the seats but too many of those old fans, who've always been at the movies, are gone.

The repertory houses (their numbers thinned from last fall), are fighting back (see WATSUP page). And both the Science Centre and the AGO are entering the film field with both feet. Perhaps the lull is momentary.

The summer was a fallow period for first-runs. Annie Hall gave us some reason to hope that Woody Allen can discipline his gifts enough to become a director of major importance. Three Women proved that Robert Altman is interested in more than a series of Nashvilles. Beyond that, however, we were treated to Julie Christie being molested by a computer designed by de Sade, a run of dum-dee-dum thrillers, and an orphanage of Rocky's bastard children.

What's worse is that the fall release schedules augur much more of the same. We are promised a spate of Hollywood testimonials to the poor-but-honest working class. If they would send me even one to equal Lindsay Anderson's This Sporting Life I might endure the rest content. As it is I'm left going for a Canadian spin-off set in the Post Office (perhaps starring Burton Cummings).

There are a few impending spots of light. Tony Richardson's version of Fielding's Joseph Andrews is scheduled to open in late October. Louis Malle is at work on a film with the unlikely title of Pretty Baby. One of the Carradines is starring while Bergman's right-hand Sven Nykvist is handling the cameras. Sadly we'll have to wait at least 'til Christmas.

For watchers of actresses the autumn holds out more than hope. We'll be able to examine Diane Keaton as she is Looking for Mr. Goodbar, and gawk at Julie Christie who left her computer for another go with Warren Beatty. Beatty is remaking the minor classic Here Comes Mr. Jordan under the title Heaven Can Wait. The best of the lot ought to be Fred Zinneman's Julia starring Jane Fonda and Vanessa Redgrave as Lillian Hellman and her enigmatic friend Julia. The section of Hellman's Penitence from which the story is drawn is more than remarkable. It is hard to imagine how even Hollywood could ruin it.

Also in the wings are Outrageous and Sebastiane, the former a Canadian 'sensation' the latter a tribute to the patron saint of male homosexuals. Neither has, at this time, a release date.

As ever there will be more. Clyde Gilmour will review them all but I won't. My masochism is a volunteer psychosis.

Kim Ian Michalski

P.S. - I ought to say something about this summer's boffo hit Star Wars. I won't say much. Despite all the hype, and the intellectualisations concerning the 'phenomenon' of the film, there is little to consider after the five minutes of credits have faded. No one ought to be astounded that the general public enjoys simple plots, white heroes, nubile princesses in danger, bureaucratic or black villains, and cute robots. George Lucas simply put into practice something which film-makers have known since the first magic lantern shows. And it's a great ride while you're there.

"Firstly, you're either a revolutionary or you're not, and if you're not you might as well be an artist. Secondly, if you can't be an artist, you might as well be a revolutionary."

—Tom Stoppard Travesties

All of which doesn't leave us much choice,

not even the option of innocent voyeurism. This summer, however, Canadians witnessed a revolutionary moment in art history, when a collection of works by the Group of Seven travelled to Moscow for a showing in the Pushkin Museum of Fine Arts. Soviet enthusiasm for the exhibition amounted to much more than a nod and 'da...da...dada...dada'. Russian visitors expressed a strong affinity with the typically rugged and severe landscapes in the paintings.

In fact, Canadian artists made a strong showing in Toronto this summer. The Art Gallery of Ontario presented exhibitions by Prairie artist Robert Sinclair and Charles William Jefferys, a pioneer in twentieth century Canadian landscape painting. But the most noteworthy Canadian exhibition in Toronto featured tapestries designed by twenty-three Canadian painters and sculptors including Harold Town, William Kurelek, Michael Snow, Joyce Wieland, Claude Breeze, Jack Bush, Tony Onley and others. Skilled artisans wove the tapestries but the entire process appeared to be a sophisticated arts and crafts system, from concept to execution. The popularity of the show was not surprising. I mean, aren't we all into texture?

As for this fall, Canadian collections are being swilled around to stock the new Canadian wing of the AGO. However, European exhibitions for the season in local galleries will easily compete in popularity. Gallery Moos's Masters of the Twentieth Century is presently showing some of the finest pieces of Picasso, Klee, Munch, Miro, and Renoir. Badende Knaben by Munch is one of his few joyful oils. Chagall's Amoureux a la Tour Eiffel, with its winged lover combines the motifs of the woman, love, and gaiety which occur throughout the exhibition.

Dubuffet has one small oil in this collection, but the Albert White Gallery's major fall show, opening on October 1, will offer an exclusive selection of Dubuffet's art. Regarded as one of France's most important painters, Dubuffet has clearly influenced the growth of Quebec's automatiste artists.

All the serenity of the "Golden Age" in Europe will emerge in the AGO's exhibition opening September 27 of "The Dutch Cityscape in the Seventeenth Century." This motif has been largely ignored despite the enormous influence of Jan Vermeer's View of the Delft and Ruysdael's city harbours. The theme should provide an interesting bridge between Dutch landscape painting and the highly realistic interiors and still life paintings. Well worth an afternoon.

There's a brief scenario of the art scene past, present and future. So what will it be, then? Revolution or Art?

Ann Walmaley

LET THEM KNOW WE'RE HERE

*The fact is that in July, there were 878,000 people looking for work and only 61,332 job vacancies.

*Students and the public have been steadfastly blocked from participating in the preparation of a new national student-aid plan through three years of Federal-Provincial talks. These have failed to produce a new plan.

Dear Prime Minister,

September, 1977

I am gravely disappointed that your government has let unemployment climb since 1975, hurting millions of Canadians, when massive job creation, additional unemployment benefits and full compensatory student aid could have improved the situation of the unemployed, of whom half are students and other young people.

also

I ask that your government move quickly, with full opportunity for public and student participation, to establish a new federal student aid plan which operates on the basis of students' actual costs and resources, meets the unique situation of part-time students and is no disincentive to needy students.

1/21 Remembrance Day 1977 1/21 Remembrance Day 1977

is for Architecture

Ask any graduate architecture student what he or she is doing and they'll tell you - looking for a job. But they will also tell you that things are much better than they were six months ago and that's why they're bothering to look. After all, Toronto is still Boom Town and the last hotel-convention centre (a sure-fire indicator) has not yet been built. Even a hasty sampling (as this is) reveals a number of interesting developments on the local architectural scene.

Last week the Arthur Erickson plan for the New Massey Hall was unveiled at City Hall, presented with all the appropriate verbal and architectural verbosity. Like most of downtown, it is completely covered with mirrors and similarly it lacks any vital relation to the street or the rest of the city.

The new complex will be on the site of the old CPR Terminal building at south-west corner of King and Simcoe. Demolition of the rather interesting CPR building is nearly complete. The New Hall itself is an immense oval structure at the east end of the site and will apparently be one of the world's finest concert halls. West of the hall will be opening a large square enclosed by medium height mirrored office blocks.

Yet the public gesture of the square is meaningless because it provides no useful pedestrian connection, and unless you work in the offices or are at a concert, there is no reason to be there. One can expect the Erickson scheme to appear as rather static and aloof in comparison to the slightly dowdy but friendly (and acoustically superb) old Massey Hall.

Across town there is another kind of project getting under way. The St. Lawrence housing project will be started within the month. The project is particularly interesting because it is laid out in a rather traditional (although recently unused) Toronto manner even though its financing will come from assorted public housing authorities.

It mimics much of the downtown residential areas with a very simple grid of streets and laneways. Unlike the low-cost housing projects such as Alexander Park (at Augusta south of Dundas), which works on an isolated and confused pedestrian path, St. Lawrence will use the street as the organizer. The site is bordered by the railway to the south, Sherbourne to the east, Yonge to the west and Front to the north: at present a rather desolate industrial wasteland. Included in the project is a sizable park running along Esplanade for nearly the length of the project and a significant amount of retail and office space so the area will have some economic diversity. More on the St. Lawrence in another issue.

The Athletic Complex is beginning to get out of the hole it's in, but its monolith form only brings to mind the problems of the south west campus, which only brings to mind the issue of the Campus as the Campus Centre. And that's an issue in itself.

It was reported to me that an oversize man in a very expensive suit answering to the name of Raymond Moriyama, was witnessed depositing a very large cheque in a local bank. The New Central Library will open in Oct. Watch for a review soon, same place.

The Art Gallery of Ontario will open its new wing on September 25, which will house additional gallery space for Canadian work and some extensive workshop facilities. The workshops look great from Beverly.

Closer to home, the School of Architecture has its new director: Blanche van Ginkel who will head the school as the program moves from being a five year undergraduate professional degree to a six year masters degree. Ms. van Ginkel replaces Peter Prangnell, who has returned from a year's sabbatical in god-knows-where and is heading first year staff.

Wednesday night lectures at the School of Architecture (230 College Street) will feature, among others, California architect Charles Moore.

In the meantime, back to the drawing board.

University Lunch and Learn Club

Meeting weekly at noontime, the programme of the University Lunch and Learn Club provides opportunities to hear guest lecturers speak on topics chosen for their current interest to the general public, on contemporary trends in scholarship, and on the implications and impact of modern research in various disciplines.

Instead of offering a substantial meal during a two-hour lunch period, as many similar clubs do, the University Lunch and Learn Club offers a paperbag lunch during a one-hour session. Participants may bring a bag lunch or purchase one on site. Here modesty of comparison ceases: the Club's intellectual fare is distinguished and interesting. Club membership is drawn from the University and nearby business and residential communities. There is opportunity for dialogue among members and speakers as a discussion period follows each of the formal presentations, which are normally about forty minutes in length.

Time: Fridays 12:15 - 1:15 p.m.
Location: Innis College Town Hall (at the corner of St. George and Sussex Streets one block south of the St. George Subway Station)

Camp Camille Cops Claps

Publicity hype from New York usually seems more appealing than our indigenous variety. When Clive Barnes describes a theatrical event as "You can, and probably will, laugh until the tears run down your face", and then those same words are used to announce a performance by the New York-based Ridiculous Theatre Company, who would dare doubt that it was anything but the truth? Well, after Tuesday night's opening of The Ridiculous Theatre Company's Camille at Factory Theatre Lab, I would certainly say that publicity superlatives, regardless of their national base, can be terribly misleading. Camille is often funny, but seldom overwhelmingly so. And perhaps expecting Charles Ludlam's adaptation from a Dumas novel of this essentially tragic story to be simply funny obscures its real value.

Central to The Ridiculous Theatre Company's style in Camille is camp. A word of rather nebulous origin, here I mean camp as that quality of adopting and exaggerating a period's style to give it a contemporary and personal meaning. It's not the same as slavishly copying an art form or fashion. Rather it requires, in the case of theatre anyway, that new energy be brought to old tales while maintaining their outward form.

The Ridiculous Theatre Company's success with Camille rests on the actor's ability to both extend the concerns, dress and mannerisms of Dumas' tale, sift it through the Greta Garbo movie, and take it the next short step to the ridiculous and emphasize (but not create) unconscious links between that period and ours. The Ludlam play is at its best when Camille asks her maid to put a bundle of sticks on the fire — the word for a bundle of sticks, of course, is a faggot. When Nanine replies that there are none here, Camille knowingly eyes the audience and says "I don't believe that." Similarly, the surfing moral equation of the stage and prostitution, that was also undoubtedly part of Dumas' era, is drawn out for the laugh it deserves.

After the first act's wonderfully sustained hysteria of food orgies and trysts complete with batting eyelashes, however, these moments of successful comic camping become more sparse. It begins to feel the same as a tired burlesque or vaudeville routine. In the first act, "ridiculous" means "funny." But by the third act the company has brought out (I would suspect consciously) another dimension of ridiculous that a reluctant audience is forced to see. It's ridiculous with a slight edge to it — the precipice of irrationality that surrounds many of our romantic themes, class stereotypes, "tragic sacrifices" and serious theatrical performances.

This transition is not smooth, which may account for the audience's restlessness near the end. Some of the actors games become tiresome. The fact that most of the primary male and female roles are played by men becomes just another joke on being in "drag." Their camping is less contemporary than say The Rocky Horror Show to begin with, so when it slows the audience is lost. The great danger is that the play's maudlin conclusion will seem silly. And that isn't nearly as effective as ridiculous. Still, I doubt that I could ever again accept a serious interpretation of Camille. The image of Ludlam's mincing and cooing will always superimpose itself on any tragic female Camille.

Black and White in Colour:

A Hut Too Far

Critics have maintained, at least since Poe, that the essential difference between lyric poetry and epic, or between the short story and the novel, is that the shorter works depend primarily on tone while in longer spaces, content and plot come to the fore.

Film, though it is often linked with or swiped from the novel has always seemed to me to be closer in nature to the short story. Despite the expansiveness and visual detail offered by celluloid, depth (as is only proper for a two-dimensional image) is an almost impossible achievement. When a film-maker attempts to recreate the discursive depth of a novel, the film, like Greed, or 1900 expands in time to the point at which the audience is sorely tired even to attempt to sit out the duration. Even the most successful highly plotted films (Ford's westerns, The Big Sleep, The Long Goodbye) depend for much of their impact on a consistency of tone.

These thoughts occur in the wake of Jean-Jacques Annaud's Black and White in Colour. The film is scarcely new, having won the best Foreign Film award in the '76 Oscar Derby, but it has only recently surfaced in such backwaters as Toronto.

The film was shot in the Cote d'Ivoire and was the result of a co-operative venture undertaken by French film-makers and the Cote d'Ivoire's answer to the NFB. It concerns the colonial masters of French West Africa during the First World War.

A delicate pairing of topics at the best of times, war and colonialism are subjects more likely than most to uninspire polemic, sanctimonious maundering, and earth-shaking significance. In many ways, although it hurts the sensibility to admit it, anti-war films are often more offensive to the aesthetic intelligence than Green Beret epics. There is something troubling about a voice mouthing words which you believe, or even wish to give voice to yourself, in the tones of United Church minister wagging his finger. Give me forthright wrong-headedness anyday!

Accordingly the tone of the work, and the touch of the creator, are all-important. To avoid the temptation to preach, and to allow the situation to explain itself, even to allow oneself to enter into the positions of those whose position is abhorant to you, is essential to the creation of any successful work of art. Even aesthetically satisfying political films, such as those of Costa-Gavras, or Bertolucci's Before the Revolution prove, in retrospect, to be manipulative almost unto propaganda.

Annaud has managed to skirt the pitfalls which lie to either side. He manages to portray his colonialists with the correct measure of understanding. When we piously condemn excesses of the white man in Africa or Asia, it is easy to forget the world from which they came and the opportunities for the indulgence of the forbidden which their new situation offered them. For the lower middle class man setting out into the land of the savages it was a chance to shed the conventions of Victorian England or its continental counterparts. He could fuck the natives and wallow in his own shit. There was no one there to proclaim morality, and, as the natives weren't really anything approaching the level of humanity, nothing done - to them could matter much to the eye of heaven.

Black and White is set in Port Coulais, a peasant town somewhere in West Africa with a black population of several hundred and a white population of nine. Annaud's hero, the young geographer Frenoy, notes that the Africans remind him of French paysans which is just what his fellow whitefolk are. Three of the men are shopkeepers. Two of them have wives. There are two priests who are off in the savanna christianising. There is a sergeant who defends the outpost and drinks too much. And there is Frenoy, a recent graduate who writes to his old friends at the Sorbonne asking after Debussy's new compositions and the latest offering of Peggy.

Sometime in 1915 they discover that they have been at war with Germany for some months, and they remember that the reason Fort Coulais is where it is, is that it is almost at the border of the neighbouring German colony.

War, of course, means war. They sing a rousing chorus of the Marseillaise and march off to conquer the German outpost (population three whites and a machine gun). They conscript the able bodied natives, train them for three hours and trek, all but the sergeant dressed for a Sunday picnic in the impressionist-gone-dowdy manner. They do not know about the machine gun.

After the inevitable retreat they begin to expect the German counterattack. At this point Frenoy begins to take over. The latter half of the film is concerned with his militarisation of the village, their laying siege to the German outpost, and the eventual arrival of British troops who announce that the war is over and that the German territory is now the property of the English King.

The story itself has striking elements. The village is a microcosm of the colonial experience, the battles are a minor model of war (even to the extent of trenches in the savanna). Both are hedging onto burlesque.

It is here that Annaud's curious mastery of tone asserts itself. The situation is at the same time comic to the point of low farce and real to the point of dead blacks. The balance struck between the two is extraordinary. Both Frenoy and the sergeant see the absurdity of their fellow Frenchmen's patriotic zeal but neither of them question the necessity to at very least, defend their patch of la patrie. The natives amuse themselves with songs about the rotundity of the whites they are forced to bear about but in their minds there is no question that they can do anything but carry the weight.

The colonialists are revealed as petty selfish people willing to take any advantage, but the blacks make any shift they can to gain points. There are no noble savages in Fort Coulais. There is no nobility anywhere, except, perhaps, in Frenoy and his black adjutant Bartolemy.

But Frenoy is only an exemplar of those ideals which sent the best minds of his generation to perish of bullets or disease in the trenches, and Bartolemy is only a native who is learning the lessons of his colonial masters in the hopes of some day applying them to use. Bartolemy will still allow himself to be slapped by a white man, but he will no longer back down. He enjoys his newfound power over the whites and over his own people. His character (briefly sketched as it is) seems to portend the history of black Africa in the sixty years which have followed 1918. (I do wish there had been credits at the end of the movie, whoever played Bartolemy deserves any award which might come his way.)

Frenoy, at the outset an idealist and a humanitarian, is corrupted by necessity. He is the sole man of ability in the settlement but his transformation into the model of the technocratic officer is too suitable and too complete to be blamed on the occasion. He hates his fellow whites for having revealed his nature, but he realizes the truth in the unveiling.

Again it is the tone of Annaud's which validates the portrait. Black and White is not the tale of a young man's disillusion — the tension between the comic and the newsreel prevents any such focus. Frenoy's development is only another aspect of the change and energy for potential change which permeates the movie. A picnic ground may become a battlefield in a moment. Everything is uncertain if, unlike the settlers, or the natives grown used to carrying whitefolk, one has the eyes to see it. There is nostalgia for France, for Europe before the war. There is the turning over of the order which the war itself produces, and there is the future which may hold changes beyond the fears of any characters.

In the last scene of the film, the black (Indian) officers of the 34th Highlanders play bagpipes while Frenoy and his German counterpart (a philologist educated in Heidelberg) walk together. Blacks sip French wine, and the Frenchwomen are seated with the Anglo-Indian NCO's. Labels are falling in tatters everywhere. Frenoy says to his companion, 'You know, before all this I was a socialist.' His companion replies, even more sadly, 'So was I.'

Holography

Holographic art has been sprung on an unsuspecting public in an exhibition being presented at the Bay Centre (Bloor and Yonge) until September 17. Holograms are three dimensional visual images produced by the exposure of laser light onto light sensitive film. Though the actual photographic process was developed in the late forties, the exploration of holograms as an art form is still in its infancy.

For the viewer, these holograms represent a total departure from the single planed, left to right, top to bottom type of visual perception that Gutenberg mechanized five hundred years ago. Holograms appear to have no physical substance, yet they exist visually in their own space as much as do you or I. They entice the viewer to reach out and touch them.

The visual potential of holography is fully exploited by the thirteen works that the New York Museum of Holography has chosen to illustrate this innovative process. Most of the works rely on heavy-handed visual ploys to impress on the viewer the three dimensional properties of holography. By example, Anait's Whipped Cream shows a woman writing the words "whipped cream" using a nozzled container of whipped cream. As the viewer walks around the hologram, he sees a moving arm in the act of applying frothy edible whipped cream.

In the same way, Dave Schmidt's Cable Car, depicts a San Francisco trolley rotating on its tracks at the top of a hill. The car displays all of its four sides as it rotates. The people in the scene reveal both chests and backs as the viewer moves around the exhibit. When the viewer stops, the action is frozen into a floating mirage that actually exists in space.

If these notions are a challenge to understand in print, a challenge also exists in trying to visually appreciate holographic art. The exhibition at The Bay Centre seems, at times, like a rube's paradise, as patrons look furtively about them to observe someone in the act of properly viewing these perplexing images. For those who discover the novel laws of perception that holography demands, there is the reward of an eerie three dimensional sense that has been, until recently, the private domain of Alice, in her journey through the looking glass.

SELF-INDULGENCE

The evil that men do, lives after them; the good oft lies in their back issues. In the case of The Varsity some evils keep resurfacing and producing ever more senile copy. I have been recalled from pasture to drivell on, sermonizing, moralizing, even, d.v., philosophizing.

Last year's Review staff, struggling arduously, attempted to provide balanced coverage of the arts world in Toronto. The relative interest in each art fluctuates, of course, from season to season, as the arts generally do from decade to decade and age to age. For creative activity feeds on itself, and poets are more often agents than causes of its existence. As well as valuing the relative interest of each art to the readership, we are supposed to exist on campus, we want to comment intelligently on what is presented for the audience of which we form a part.

To comment acutely on what is performed and produced under the heading "Art" requires ongoing and continuous effort on the part of the Review staff. We strive to be informative, and to create from our observations small models of fine writing — not necessarily baroque constructions or monolithic chunks of prose, but also straightforward descriptions which evoke sensitive reactions in readers by an exact choice and placement of words.

Each writer for the Review should feel an obligation to read his copy once it is published. Most do so, of course, out of vanity in the first case, and in sheer terror thereafter, for one's mistakes are more glaring when they are in black and white and in 18,000 faceless and scornful pairs of hands. No position is more impossible to maintain than that of the fledgling controversialist, for the breed devours its young. It is rarely the misquoted or maligned victim of a critical piece who shreds a writer's pride; rather, another writer, responding to one's venom with his own outraged properties. One man's position, in this business, is another's daily bread.

Nevertheless, in the criticism of art, as in politics (though the necessity of both these endeavours of the spirit is regularly questioned), not to have an opinion renders the effort not only worthless but also tedious. The opinions expressed ought to be bolstered by an experience continually growing, by an organic perception of the interrelated arts, and by sensitivity. Criticism is often understood by the general public as being a purely negative exercise. No-one who 'pans' an event outright without explanation is competent. If one's artistic soul is so outraged by the perpetration of junk masquerading as art, the pen should not hit the paper until analytical cruelty has replaced incoherent outrage. The Varsity rarely, we are pleased to say, has resorted to scurrilous journalism — though it can be found regularly in the daily papers.

One reason for our temperance, is that we rarely have to write for overnight production; we have space available for longer pieces; we welcome corrective opinions to those produced by our staff writers. Because we are largely subsidized by student fees, we have room at our disposal. Our problems, however, are those of staffing. How do we, and how should we, arrange for writers to appear in our pages? The Review does owe a debt to the university and to its students.

On the one hand, The Varsity is not the preserve of a self-appointed intellectual elite, whatever may be said about us. We actively seek out informed opinions and good writing, and we edit with care (and, o, the agonies to every one's personality that causes.") We would like to raise the level of the paper, in terms of skill, even if the editors and their henchmen are left in the contrails of others' minds.

Writers on the arts are under an obligation to draw on all their experience in evaluating the effort they have witnessed. An expression of judgement is called for, even if it is only an honest confession of bewilderment. The public reads reviews partly as roughage, to grind away until only kernels of opinion and truth remain. They receive, in the best examples, a framework from which the assessment depends. One may disagree entirely with the premises, yet admire the writing; one can find fault with the opinion yet derive enough information to form a counter-opinion. The reviewer owes a debt to the audience who attended with him, those who are a potential audience, and those involved in the performance itself. To each he must reveal his reactions, indicate why the art succeeded or failed, and the reasoning which led to that judgement.

As an editor, and as a reader, I have no patience with an opinion not linked to reasoning. If I admire polemical works, I nevertheless classify them as rhetorical and not critical. And it is criticism which the Review sets before you on Fridays, not diatribes.

It cannot be doubted, it seems to me, that writing on the arts is didactic. It is an exercise of judgement, not merely comment as if the art experience were a phenomenon never to be repeated. It is a deliberately created thing which, in most cases, you are watching or otherwise experiencing; even where it is deliberate randomness to which the critic or the audience is subjected, there is a philosophical purpose behind its presentation. Unless it is there to irritate you.

There are standards of writing which are set for the would-be critic. There is a definite loss of innocence involved in watching with the eye of an observer one's pleasure or lack of pleasure in art, which much critical comment is necessarily derived from. But as well as standards of writing by which we can judge the writer who judges, so also we can assess his humanity.

Elitism has a long and honourable history. The judgement of 'good' is in fact a legitimate philosophical enterprise, and it seems strange that in this century the faculty of judgement between two ways of thinking is considered repugnant. If we accept the idea that man has a self which can be developed, and that culture is, in its broadest definition, the way in which man learns and transmits his learning of the higher being which he potentially is — if, that is, culture is paideia, or the learning of the ideal — then we also accept that it is to be ranked ahead of technical learning, skills, or what the Greeks would call techné or craft. We can as critics rate performances and productions first and foremost on their successful maintenance of illusion, their techné, the force that maintains us in the idea — but we can also, at some point, be entitled to feel that Beckett, say is sterile, and that twenty-three performances of a Shakespearean play will yield more of value than the same number of a play by Wilde. And art is not so-called because it is onanie, an isolated pleasure — it is revealed to the community for the instruction of the community.

Criticism takes on a moral function. It is both descriptive and ultimately, prescriptive. It demands honesty from the critic, a kind of transparency that many cannot achieve, and provides the best of all disciplines for the critic by making him transparent. Criticism is not hostile to art; it is, however, often a critique of art in terms of its effectiveness. It is true that far too few of our staff have participated in the art forms they review, but they are not without responsibility for all that. The Review inclines to believe that good will and good judgement are the primary equipment of the critic.

If you have these, and are willing to engage in fair dialogue with an editor, then do not be content with exposing to your best friend the incompetence of The Varsity's reviewing staff. Write us letters or write reviews for us. At some far future date, some of us at least will earn the title of critic. Until then, we will learn the hardest way — by making errors in public, and risking censure for them.

Welcome back, philharmonians. It's like Christmas-Eve: goodies galore are on the horizon, or just arrived.

The Canadian Opera Company began its fall season Wednesday with the opening of Verdi's Don Carlos. Directed by Lotti Mansouri, and starring Ermanno Mauro, Paul Plishka and Tatiana Troyanos, the production has five remaining performances at O'Keefe Centre, Sept. 16, 18, 20, 22 and 24. $6-22.50, with rush seats available the day of the show at 11:00 a.m. for $5. 7:30 p.m.

The Beethoven Festival from the Toronto Symphony continues tonight (Sept. 16) and tomorrow under the baton of Klaus Tennstedt, and featuring Pinchas Zukerman violin. The program includes the violin concerto and the Eroica Symphony. Next week, Andrew Davis returns (Thursday through Saturday) to conduct the Leonore No. 3 Overture, and the fourth and fifth symphonies. Massey Hall, $4-12, 363-7301 8:30 p.m.

Sept. 20, at St. Paul's Church, 227 Bloor St. E., George Thalben, university organist of Birmingham, matches his skills up with one of Toronto's larger instruments. $2.50, 961-8116.

Music Gallery isn't waiting for others to get things going. September 17 (Saturday), Array appears at the gallery, 30 St. Patrick St., at 8:30 p.m.; 598-2400 for information. Thursday Sept. 22, at 8:30, "Concert for Radios, Telephones, Tapes, People and Whales," presented by Interspecies, and OCA students, will be directed by Udo Kasemets.

Since a good percentage of Toronto theatre audiences are university educated, and an equally significant number probably attended the University of Toronto, and assuming only 50 per cent of those people read the Varsity Review, then the theatre reviewers and critics seen in these pages have undoubtedly had some influence on Toronto theatre audiences. (It is left for "Theory of Drama" classes to assess the role of criticism in developing audience taste). The point is that we are worth reading.

If theatre "lovers" find our writers' opinions intolerably capricious or incomprehensibly quixotic, then there are three satisfying alternatives to using the Review to wrap fish and chips—write reviews yourself, send a letter demanding the guillotine for the offending writer, or simply read this column every week for information on what plays are happening. Besides, I won't be doing the Watsup this year (John Wilson will be returning as editor), so there will perhaps be fewer snarky comments and more facts.

Anyway, forget about studying this fall, there is too much theatre happening to bother with books. That, at least, is how I feel after seeing my Graduate Drama Centre course load. For a start, here's what is coming up.

An important theatre event may have been the appearance at Factory Lab on Sept. 13 of the Ridiculous

Theatre Company of New York's production of Camille. "Absurdity" is the complimentary adjective often used to describe this company's work. Clifford Odet's drama of the Depression Awake and Sing opens at the St. Lawrence Centre on Sept. 14. This last of Theatre Plus' productions for the season is directed by Marion Andre. For information call 366-7723. Also opening this week at the busy Aladdin Theatre is Oscar Wilde's The Importance of Being Earnest.

The only crazy thing that has happened this week may not just be registration. Toronto Free Theatre began its fall season with a one man dadaist show called Merz, Sneeze-Poems and the Like. Unless a massive dose of Vitamin C can cure it, the play should have opened for a short run beginning Sept. 14. 368-2856.

Shows that will be continuing for a while yet include Alan Ayckbourn's The Norman Conquests at the sometimes interesting Phoenix Theatre (interesting that is, when they're not trying to be a sophisticated Toronto Truck) 922-7835, Vanities at the Teller's Cage, East of Eaton's at the Old Firehall Theatre and Plaf at Schubert's Cabaret.

And finally some highlights of things to come next week so that planning your social calendar will be made easier. Save an evening for Theatre Pass Muraille's new collective creation called Shakespeare for Fun and Profit — A Canadian Dream opening Sept. 21. For the benefit of purists, it should be emphasized that this play does incorporate at least 65 per cent of Shakespeare's A Midsummer's Night Dream. 366-7723. Paul Gaulin's Mime Troupe returns Sept. 28 with its almost annual beginning of the year production of Mirage. This time, however, it will be presented in a new mime theatre called The Unlimited Space that seems to have taken over 95 Danforth from Le Theatre du P'tit Bonheur. 924-1373. And Theatre Compact will present Buchner's modern morality play Wozzeck at the Bathurst St. Theatre beginning Sept. 26.

By the way, how many people know what the York Mystery Cycle is anyway?

So tomorrow's Saturday and you need to unwind from the first-week frazzles. Suddenly the line between myth and reality has become fuzzy. The year promises books, words, and more words. You register a frantic need for pictures, maybe even art.

Just ten minutes from the campus are found most of the major Toronto galleries, with a heavy concentration in the fashionable but trendy Yorkville area. On Yorkville itself, the new Gallery Moos has opened with a spectacular collection from the Masters of the 20th Century, including Munch, Matisse, Picasso, and Chagall. This and the holographic art exhibition in the gallery at The Bay, rate as the two most exciting shows this week. Holography uses laser beams to create forms of dimensional art and moving pictures. (Holography 100 won't be offered this year). Both shows open till Oct. 1.

Again in the Yorkville area at the Sable-Castelli Gallery on Scollard Barbara Aitman's one-woman show explores new developments in colour xerox printing. For those who enjoy photo-journalism, it's open till Oct. 1. Nearby on Hazelton, prehistoric artifacts from the Art of the Americas exhibit at Mira Godard Gallery... continues till Sept. 24.

Toronto Artists Richard Stewart Halstead and Michael John Angel are showing jointly at the Prince Arthur Galleries till Sept. 22. These eerie neo-realistic and surrealist paintings are easily some of their best work. The Albert White Gallery next door features Morus Hummel's crayon and gouache work. Well worth seeing.

Six Painters from Texas at the David Mirvish Gallery till Sept. 27 is exhibiting next to Gisele Freund's unusual colour photographs including one of Virginia Woolf in 1939. Till October 19.

A comprehensive exhibition of Canadian Native art from 1790 to 1920 at the Aggregation Gallery till Sept. 29 offers both rare pieces and affordable art. An outstanding collection of Eskimo Art will open at the Queen's Park Macdonald Gallery Sept. 20. Sculpture by Erkoollk of Baker Lake previews today at the Inuit Gallery of Eskimo Art.

More photographs and Xerox prints may be found at Planetary Works, a joint exhibition by Silvia Scott and Bill Vazan at the AGO. Also at the AGO till Oct. 9 Delacroix and the French Romantic Print is an exhibit comprising post-Revolution lithographs by Delacroix, Gercault, Gros, Raffet, and Hugo. These grotesque graphics show a clear rejection of classical traditions.

Our own Hart House is presently airing a selection of works from the Permanent Collection. The exhibition lasts till Sept. 30 when other works from the collection will be showing in the new Canadian Wing of the AGO.

For those who are looking for art classes, don't forget OCA or The Three Schools.

jazz

At Yellowfingers, 1280 Bay at Yorkville: The Rob McConell - Jan McDougall Trombone Battle finished off the week, replaced next week by a 'Latin Jazz Special' featuring drummer Marty Morell, vibraphonist Don Thompson, and the Pitchees. After hours Fri. and Sat. 1:30 - 4:00 a.m. features the Maury Kaye Quintet, with Maury on keyboards and vocals. Sunday dinner concert: Ed Bickert and friends, 6:30 - 10:30 p.m. 964-1984.

At Blondie's, 1954 Yonge at Davisville: The Bruce Cassidy Quartet (trumpet), with a superb rhythm section of Bernie Senensky, Terry Clarke and Dave Young, until Sat. Next week, the Eugene Amaro Quartet (sax and flute). Eugene is one of Toronto's best talents. 482-0055.

Bourbon St., 180 Queen W., features Marvin Stamm (trumpet) this week followed by Red Norvo on vibes for a two week stint. 598-3020.

Moe Koffman, resident flautist at George's, 290 Dundas E., entertains until Sept. 17, superseded by an equally dynamic Kathryn Moses Quartet until Sept. 24. 923-9887.

BIC's Coffee House, 11 Yorkville, tentatively has the George Bolley organ trio scheduled for this weekend.

We'll keep you informed in this column of the final scheduling arrangements at this new and promising club. No cover! 923-2943.

Music Gallery, 30 Patrick St. The 'free jazz' of the CCMC is simultaneously composed and played every Tues. and Fri. $2 admission. 598-2400.

The Eugene Amaro Quintet plays today 5 - 7 p.m. in the Eaton Centre, Trinity Way, Level 3.

Joan Luc Ponty in concert tonight at Convocation Hall. See elsewhere in this issue.

Every Sunday 7:30 - 11:00 p.m. at Cafe May, 396 Roncesvalles, presents the Lorne Lofsky Trio for soft jazz. 532-9218.

We both know that the last thing in the world you need at the beginning of the school year is a $45 copy of Parasitology and You, so pocket your money and invest it in tickets to see that master of wry and ironic wit, Mr. Frank Zappa, who will be appearing at the Gardens on the 29th. Or, if you like simplistic ballads, Rod Stewart will be playing on Oct. 9 at the same location.

In the quiet realm, Pete Seeger will play Massey Hall on Oct. 2 followed on the fourth by Dan "The man" Hill. The bare-footed wonder will probably showcase pieces off his new album.

Convocation Hall is off to an inspiring start with Jean Luc Ponty performing to-night, followed by J.J. Cale and Dave Bradstreet (apparently the latest underground folk megastar) on the 24th and bluesmen Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee on the 30th.

If comedy is your thing, Randy Newman will be appearing at Massey Hall on Oct. 4.

As for the clubs, Dominic Troiano is playing the El Mocambo tonight. He'll be followed next week by the traditional Wayne Cochran and the C.C. Riders. FM will be disappearing into an electronic void for a little while, so if you'd like to see them before they reach that great digital relay system in the sky, they'll be playing tonight and next week at the Chimney.

The Colonial has re-opened with a lavish new interior and a policy of only hiring top names from now on. They're off to an inauspicious start with the Quicksilver Messenger Service this week, but the line-up for the next few months includes Dizzy Gillespie, Buddy Miles and, no kidding, B.B. King. Could be a lot of fun.

I hate film buffs and reviewers. Yet here I propose to map out each week of movie-going. But how long has my arm been twisted to do so. And my mind has been turned with threats to give over the column to the fans of Ford and the acolytes of Wertmuller.

Accordingly you will be treated to a weekly perusal of my prejudices which are many and in some cases violent. From time to time I will be relinquishing this space to pundits of other minds. Applications for a week's sojourn may be left at the Review Office.

The week is a warm-up to the heavyweight programs which approach, a mixture of the familiar and the unknown. There's nothing here to make a sensible person put off a drinking bout, but if you're stranded some night...

Friday 16: The Revue (on Roncesvalles, 3 blocks south of Bloor and Dundas, 531-9959) before it launches a series of week-long engagements for 'significant' films, offers Bashki's Wizards and Brooks' Young Frankenstein which argue to be two of the most shown films in town this year so don't hurry. The New Yorker replies with two pseudo-sophisticated dirty movies, Bashki's earlier exercise in sophomoric scatology Fritz the Cat and something in the same vein called Dirty Duck which (despite music by Flo and Eddie) should be much worse. Cinema Lumiere (College at Spadina, 925-9938) has children in France with Truffaut's very early short Les Moustons, Godard's equivalent work All Boys are Called Patrick, and Malle's remarkable Murmur of the Heart.

Sat. 17: The New Yorker, have moved their usual midnight entry The Rocky Horror Picture Show forward to prime time. Lumiere repeats its children (there are no excuses for missing that bill twice) while the Revue opens a week of La Grande Bourgeoise which promises sex, decadence, political scandal and nobility rolled up in one glossy two hour package. There are shows at 7:15 and 9:30 each night.

Sun. 18: What could be more fitting for the Lord's Day than the New Yorker's bill of El Topo and Satyricon? Well it might be Lumiere's showing of Peter Brook's superb production of King Lear (watch for the scene on the beach and for Jack McGowan's definitive Fool). Or the Science Centre's 7:30 presentation of Reinhard Hauff's Paule Paulander (another kidskill). Hauff, yet another of the new German directors, will be on hand to discuss his work.

Mon. 19: Hauff is again presenting at the Science Centre. The offering is Zundschneure a film about children in the German underground in WWII. Lumiere shows two excellent films from the Prague Spring, Jan Kadar's Adrift and Jiri Menzel's Closely Watched Trains. The New Yorker has two of Eric Rohmer's six moral tales Chloe In The Afternoon and Claire's Knee. Some people consider Rohmer the ideal of the intelligent, urbane French style. I don't.

Tues. 20: The Science Centre has booked composer Miklos Rozsa to discuss his scores (and one assumes, the use of music in film) for the next three nights. They begin with the classic The Lost Weekend. Most of us should have recovered enough by Tuesday to be up there watching. Lumiere repeats Monday's program while the New Yorker features two films by inexplicably popular directors: Wertmuller's Love and Anarchy and Bertolucci's The Conformist. Afterwards there will be discussions of which of the two has the foggy idea of fascism.

Wed. 21: Noble Spaniards, malevolent Moors, sweeping landscapes and seemingly endless battles at the Science Centre with El Cid. Guilt, degradation, and sandboxes at the New Yorker with Bergman's Shame and Teshigahara's Woman in the Dunes. The former twice, worse luck. More Italian politics, private intrigues and much more sand at Lumiere with Francisco Rosi's Hands Over the City and Antonioni's Red Desert.

Thurs. 22: Lumiere repeats. The New Yorker threatens with a Jack Nicholson triple (!!!) bill The Last Detail, Five Easy Pieces, and The King of Marvin Gardens. Only the last of these (at 10:00) validates the pain. And, for closers, the Science Centre has the scoop of the week with Rosza introducing Alain Resnais' new film Provvidence. Resnais has some redeeming of himself to do after the statue show in Stavitsky. It may be worth waiting for a more general distribution and reviews, but adventurous souls might just happen onto another Murlet. Let's hope so. kim

HELP

Contrary to popular belief, the Varsity offices are not full of wild-eyed politicos screaming for blood and anarchy. The Review office, at least, is full of wild-eyed arts fans screaming for infamy and free credit tickets.

If you are interested in either the propagation or destruction of the arts and you speak at least one language, wind your way over to the Varsity office this afternoon at 2 and meet the demi-gods of aesthetic criticism: the Review staff. They need your help.

Evans: I'd rather be a doctor

U of T president John Evans denied that he is seeking a political career following his retirement as president this year.

Discounting rumours that he will run as a Liberal candidate in the Rosedale riding in the next federal elections, Evans stated in a telephone interview yesterday:

"I'm not just keeping quiet as the newspapers suggested; I really have made no decision at all."

Talk of his going into politics really came about as a result of an article published in these pages some eighteen months ago. At that time it was announced in deadpan news style that he was seeking leadership of the Social Credit party.

The story was carried across Canada on the Canadian Press wire service. Since then, he said, fundamentalist Social Creditists have written him, some saying they'd never heard of him but they were pleased to see

"interest from the east."

"It's given me a good grounding in Social Credit philosophy," he said.

While he has not discounted political plans, he really has not actively thought of going into politics, and will give preferential consideration to an offer related to a health field, he said.

Before becoming president of U of T, Evans was a medical doctor and thinks he will probably return to this field.

"No, a thousand times no."

Students question high tuition

By ANDREW MAHON

"The University is in a bit of a bind — we have to make some tough decisions," observed University of Toronto Vice-Provost Ron Missen last Friday afternoon as he met with landscape architecture students.

The Vice-Provost along with the Dean of The Faculty of Forestry and Landscape Architecture, Vidar Nordin, and assistant Dean David Love, talked with students about problems within the landscape architecture department.

The main areas of concern, as outlined by acting chairman of the department Professor Ed Fife, concerned the department budget, the status of the department within the university, and the question of a permanent chairman.

Fife, who said he was "tired of playing telephone games," introduced the meeting as a question and answer period between students and faculty.

About 100 disgruntled students in attendance wanted to know why they were paying exorbitant fees ($939) and getting relatively little in return. The vice-provost pointed out that "our programs are not driven by formula income." He explained that there was "no one-to-one correspondence between student numbers and income."

Dean Nordin expressed surprise upon learning the comparative cost of a forestry student's fees ($780) and a landscape architecture student's fees ($939). Nordin went on to suggest that a cost analysis of the students' real fee be constructed saying, "until you make your analysis, you're not going to convince anyone that your situation is any different."

Nordin continued, "There isn't any question at all that the departmental budget is low — we have to keep trying to improve the situation under difficult budgetary guidelines." "It's a poor time to realize you're behind," added Vice-Provost Missen.

Students pressed the vice-provost for clarification of the landscape architecture status: Presently affiliated with the Faculty of Forestry, students asked what future alignment was in store for their department. Missen explained that there were questions concerning the role of landscape architecture and its academic and administrative ties with the university, which must be answered before a decision could be reached. He warned that there was "no revelation in hand."

The question of alignment seemed to be the most controversial issue. Some students wanted to know why their department had to be aligned with anyone, since there seemed to be no resulting benefits for them. One student pointed out that if realignment did not mean more facilities, staff, or money for landscape architecture, then there was really no point to it, "since the last time we got moved around we didn't see any changes."

The appointment of a chairman was the most immediate question. As one uneasy student observed, "a positive step in improving this department would be the appointment of a permanent chairman."

Missen said that although he saw the need for a permanent chairman, the university was keeping "a holding pattern until we decide what we're doing." Dean Nordin added that "a decision has to be forthcoming soon."

After the meeting, Roger Orvis, President of the Landscape Architecture Student Society said the session was a "good beginning," although "they (the administration) have been putting us off." He said students felt "they were purposely being left out of the decisions." Nevertheless the LASS would go about preparing the suggested cost analysis, press for appointment of a department chairman, "and work from there with budget matters." Vice-Provost Missen declined to make any comments after the meeting.

Expansionist leader advocates a United States of Canada

By NANCY BOWES

Craig Schoonmaker, Chairman of the Expansionist Party of the United States, succeeded in convincing six people that Canada should join the United States during an episode of "The Great Debate" taped for television Saturday afternoon in Toronto. It was enough to win him the debate.

Schoonmaker's opponent in the debate was U of T economics professor Mel Watkins. Although an overwhelming majority of the audience sided with Watkins both before (59 out of 79; 4 abstaining) and after (55 out of 79; 2 abstaining) the debate, Schoonmaker managed to sway 4 originally against joining the U.S. and 2 undecided to his side.

Schoonmaker hit the headlines in both Canada and the U.S. this summer by announcing that he had formed the Expansionist Party of the United States with the goal of convincing Canada to join the United States.

The main argument used by Schoonmaker was that it is more expensive for Canada and the United States to be two separate countries. "When people cease to be different . . . they should join together — especially when it saves money," he claimed.

Watkins said Schoonmaker represents America's fondness for meddling in the affairs of other countries. The economics professor wondered aloud why Schoonmaker should attempt the formal political union of Canada and the United States when economic dependence is already a fact. Watkins maintained that such a position is old-fashioned. He said twentieth century imperialism is carried out by the multinational corporations, not by individual nations.

In an interview after the taping, Schoonmaker was asked how he gained his knowledge of Canada. The 32-year-old New Yorker replied that the basis of his knowledge of Canada is derived from an

Varg needs volunteers

Wondering how to best use your spare time?

There are a number of ways you can contribute your ideas and enthusiasm to The Varsity. First of all you can volunteer to help report the news, write articles, take pictures, draw cartoons or help on production nights. No experience is necessary. In fact we especially welcome first and second year students who would like to become involved in student affairs for the first time through The Varsity.

But The Varsity is much more than a passive observer of campus and provincial events. It's a centre for the lively exchange of ideas among students. Regular staff meetings, weekly discussion groups, and informal conversation throughout the week are mediums to trade information about events, find out what's on student minds and see what can be done about these concerns.

The Varsity is also part of the Canadian University Press (CUP) and its Ontario Region (ORCUP) through which you can meet student journalists from across the country and participate in student affairs on a national scale. The student press plays a large role in issues of local, provincial and international interest. Our voice is just as loud as, and often critical of, student councils and national student organisations.

Or, if you just want to write an occasional article and meet some people with interesting ideas, The Varsity is the place to be.

Cheerleaders try hard to "Make the Hawks sing the blues".

OSAP grants and appeals

By ADRIENNE KING

With approximately 39 per cent of the student population at U of T receiving at least some award through the Ontario Student Awards Plan (OSAP), many are faced with the perennial problem — not enough money to make ends meet. While the formula devised by the Plan is often at fault in not meeting students' financial needs, for some, it may be possible to get more out of OSAP. Students who feel they have grounds may appeal their awards through the Students Awards Office which directs individual students to the appropriate college or faculty office.

The most common grounds for appeals this year will likely be lack of summer employment. All applicants are expected to have worked the entire summer and to have saved an arbitrary amount depending on their year and sex. This amount of assumed savings is then deducted from the students' expected expenses. If the student can show that he or she did not work for any period during the summer, an appeal may be filed. To qualify, however, the student must prove that he/she was looking for work during the entire period of unemployment. A Manpower registration card and rejection slips from potential employers are some possible documentation. Those who were attending summer courses to fulfill admission requirements for entry into their chosen program, to accelerate graduation or to repeat a course failed during the year may also apply. If the appeal is granted, it is in the form of loan only.

Those who were prevented from working during the summer because of some physical incapacity may also appeal. A doctor's statement is necessary proof in this case. Assistance available in these circumstances takes the form of loan and grant.

Some students may find that a change in their own or their parents' financial situation has occurred since they filed their original OSAP application. If a reduced family income has resulted, they may be eligible for an increased award. While this would primarily affect those whose parents are self-employed, loss of income through lay-offs, strikes or illness are also possible grounds.

Students who were originally assessed as owning an automobile and who cease to own one may also appeal for a review of their assessment.

While most students residing with their parents, whether or not they are considered independent, are eligible to receive board and lodging expenses of only $36 per week for the school year, those whose parents are handicapped or receiving only government assistance are eligible for an additional amount totalling up to $61 per week.

Students who may be incurring exceptional expenses throughout the year can appeal for more assistance, though in the form of loan only. These expenses may include the cost of field trips required by the course of study, alimony payments or uninsured medical expenses.

While these are the most common areas of appeal, all students who are receiving or who have been denied assistance through OSAP can contact the Student Awards Office with their queries and problems.

The Students' Administrative

Council (SAC), has also recently instituted an OSAP advisory bureau for students who feel that they need more information, or who feel they have been unfairly dealt with.

We haven't had many queries as yet," said OSAP counsellor Wes Brown, "but we have been able to help somewhat those who have come to us."

Student input goes into five year review

By MICHAEL KANTER

As students return to the lecture halls of U of T, the struggle up above continues. On Friday morning, Dr. J. B. Macdonald, external reviewer of the Governing Council, was presented with a joint Students' Administrative Council (SAC), Graduate Students' Union (GSU) and Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students (APUS) brief by SAC University Government Commissioner Brian O'Riordan.

The meeting is part of an ongoing review process dealing with the Governing Council, U of T's top governing body. The university is presently governed by fifty members of the council, a system established under the U of T Act in 1971. Prior to this, the university government consisted of a Senate and a Board of Governors. Since the new system was implemented, there has been constant review of the University's top governing structure.

Macdonald, presently the Director of the Addiction Research Foundation and past president of the University of British Columbia, is receiving briefs from other U of T groups, such as the faculty association (UTFA), and will then make recommendations concerning the future of the system. The importance of the reviewing process is indicated by the fact that the provincial government will first consider Macdonald's recommendations before it reviews the U of T Act, 1971.

The structure of the Governing Council has long been under fire from students and faculty. Since the 1960's, students have been pushing for greater representation on university government. Since the formation of the Governing Council in 1971, there have been recommendations put forward to this effect, all without success.

This morning's meeting was, therefore, a partial continuation of the effort of the student body to attain its goal of equal representation with teaching staff on the highest decision-making body of the university. O'Riordan stressed the importance of this issue in his meeting with Macdonald, saying that if the current review process again results in no change in the faculty-student ratio, then the credibility of the Governing Council would be severely damaged in the eyes of the student body.

During the discussion Macdonald and O'Riordan agreed on the importance of settling the composition issue in order to focus on other issues. However, Macdonald reminded the student representative several times that parity would be just as unacceptable to faculty as unequal representation now is to students. He indicated that parity would not necessarily solve the problem because of faculty's strong objections.

The issue of composition was temporarily shelved as discussion shifted to focus on the question of alienation. Both Macdonald and O'Riordan mentioned the alienation of different groups from the Governing Council and tried to account for it. A lack of communication between student body and Governing Council was specifically noted.

O'Riordan felt that students are not aware of the governing body and feel distantly removed from its activity. Regarding the new grading system he noted that students wanted to channel feedback but didn't realize that the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council had already reached its decision. He hoped that through newspaper coverage the student body would become more aware of and interested in its governing structure.

The brief presented by O'Riordan mentioned several other issues related to the Governing Council. Since sixteen of the fifty council members are government appointees, the brief suggested that these members should be more representative of the general community than they have been in the past. The implication was the great majority of the appointees come from the corporate sector to the exclusion of other groups such as labor. O'Riordan wondered out loud about the method which the Premier employs for picking the appointees. He recalled that the Premier had told him "cocktail parties were fine places to get people." The obvious humor was not as obvious to O'Riordan.

The University's budget process was mentioned as an issue of importance. Both men agreed part of the process should be closed. O'Riordan attempted to point out that at present public accountability is lost because too much occurs behind closed doors. The question of specifics was harder to pin down though O'Riordan mentioned that the initial budget submission by the faculty deans should be in open session.

The meeting wound to a close while O'Riordan was emphasizing the importance of the principle of equal faculty-student representation and Macdonald was preparing to listen to briefs from other campus bodies.

New VD research project at Hassle-Free clinic

By CHERYL APPLEBAUM

No one wears an official white coat at the Hassle Free Clinic, located at 201 Church Street, and no one is called by the title doctor. Everything is designed to make the patients feel more relaxed and less embarrassed about seeking medical aid.

The clinic's primary function is to educate people about their bodies, how they can identify problems and take care of themselves; in short, to take responsibility for their own well-being.

Things are explained in simple layman's language. All the options are outlined in the wide range of free services that Hassle Free offers: venereal disease treatment, birth control and family planning, abortion referral, pregnancy testing, as well as general medical advice. The clinic is also an active member of the Canadian Association for the Repeal of Abortion Laws (CARAL).

Although Hassle Free has many doctors on staff, they don't make much profit, as only approximately 50 per cent of the patients have OHIP (Ontario Hospitalization Insurance Plan). If the patient has no money, the doctor doesn't get paid. But that's how the collective body called Hassle Free Clinic operates.

However, the clinic is well funded. 85 per cent of its capital comes from the provincial government while the remaining 15 per cent is supplied by the city.

Everyone seems to do everything at the clinic — there is no bureaucratic hierarchy — from answering the telephone to helping patients. But tending to present needs is not all there is to the clinic. It is also involved in research. Here U of T is invaluable in terms of resources and consultants, especially the Department of Community Medicine and the medical students who volunteer their time and energy.

The current research project is the preventive use of antibiotics against venereal disease. It seems that certain tetracyclines taken regularly by sexually active people with a number of partners discourage V.D. Further work in this area is slated to begin this month.

Hassle Free didn't just spring fully formed into being; the initial idea started seven years ago with the Rochdale Free Clinic in the college of the same name.

When that clinic dissolved after the closing of the college, the first Hassle Free was opened on Yonge Street. However, about two years ago cramped quarters and disputes with landlords facilitated a move to its present location.

But the primary philosophy of the Hassle Free Clinic has remained unchanged throughout the years, excellently summarized by a poster on the wall that reads: "Healthcare is for PEOPLE, not PROFIT".

ALL THE LONELY PEOPLE

Loneliness is a difficult topic to talk about. To begin with, whoever ventures to raise the topic implicitly admits that he or she has been or is lonely. Being surrounded, as we all seem to be, by "well-adjusted" people, this is an admission that one is loathe to make, indirectly or not. One would hardly like to be considered defective. The lonely person is already intensely aware of the difference between himself and his fellows. To give vent to his feelings would be to intensify his isolation further, to make himself stand out as a narcissistic introvert in a crowd of extroverts. That others always appear as extroverts is an inevitable result of the way we always see others: from the outside, solid objects whose reality unlike ours, we cannot doubt.

In consequence the one who is lonely must sooner or later view his situation as a tragic paradox. He desperately seeks fusion with others only to find that the determination with which he undertakes this search sets him apart from the others and makes of him a pathetic, even worthless, figure.

Fusion with others is a problem as long as the members of a group are each defined solely on the basis of each person's past experience and the private goals which this experience engenders. To the one who so defines himself others are only relevant insofar as they support or frustrate his plans. But since the result of one's activities is ultimately determined by the sum total of everyone's activities, not just one's own, such a person condemns himself to the depressing feeling that his life is lived for him by others.

At U of T the problem has its own way of manifesting itself. The student comes to the university as a buyer of information while the university acts as the vendor. Between one student and another there is at best the same solidarity one observes between shoppers in a department store. The only difference is that at university you get to meet the same shoppers for four years in a row. Similarly relations between students and professors are strictly cash and carry. You pay your fees, get a one year's free admission ticket and proceed to get your money's worth. The professors for their part try to earn their salary.

There are of course some exceptions. Not all professors see teaching as just a way to earn their money. Neither do all students regard their education as a shopping excursion. These exceptions, however, exist despite the present structure of the university, not because of it.

If students are lonely at U of T it is not because they don't have enough pus or because their University of Western Ontario counterparts they don't have a computerized dating service. You don't make friends at pubs, you go to meet them. As for dating services, at best they are an acknowledgment of the problem. At worst they perpetuate the very circumstances that make students feel alone and isolated.

The real problem is the university's lack of common purpose. This stems directly from the university's role in modern society, which is to train the technocrats that the elite requires to remain the elite. Given this role the university can afford very little consideration for personal aspiration and fulfillment. Since its task is to mold individuals to fit certain specifications it has to rule out free association as the mode of organization.

Whether professors like it or not their position in relation to the students is that of superiors. As for the students their association is a purely accidental one, an association based on similar course requirements rather than on any common intellectual predilection. The faculty's job is to mold, that of the students to be molded.

Common purpose and friendship require the opposite. They require that people associate with each other freely and that the common project evolves out of this association rather than be imposed on it. Were this to be the case education would become a common adventure through which all the participants would be united. Instead of mystifying the fundamental unity that exists between all those who seek to improve their understanding of the world, the university would serve to make this unity obvious to students and teachers alike.

But what about now? Can one find fulfillment and unity with others while the university remains what it is?

One can. The irony is that the only possible lasting "escape" is confrontation. Friendship and solidarity today are to be found not so much in the pubs but among those actively seeking to change things. Instead of running away from the problem, from the lack of communal spirit in the university "community", we have to attempt to turn that lack into an object of common action.

The next time you're feeling lonely try The Varsity. We're lonely too.

The editorial in last Friday's paper was not written by John Tuzyk. Can we get our money now, John?

Engineer complains

I would like to express my heartfelt and deepest dismay at the disgraceful front page of the September fourteenth issue of The Varsity.

If you are sitting there wondering what possibly could be offensive about it, then go take another look. Still can't find it, well I'll tell you.

What the hell do you think you are, a bunch of (expletive deleted) Yankees? Is The Varsity falling to the deepest depths of lowliness? Are you too cheap to print the one more letter proper English requires?

Yes, that's what I am talking about, the disgusting way in which you spell "tonight", and on the same page as a picture of the LGMB yet. Not only that, but your facsimile of a word is not even in the Random House Unabridged Dictionary of the English Language, nor in Webster's New World Dictionary and most important of all it is not in my Radio Shack Dictionary of Electronics for Morons.

Let's keep it Canadian.

National unity

I read with some interest Mario Cutajar's article in the September 14 issue of the Varsity (National Unity... With Whom and For What), and upon finishing, concluded that Mr.

Cutajar is indeed most capable of judging extremism.

His phrases were those that I have heard before: the denunciation of another (in this case, Mr. Rhodes) as some kind of loathsome fascist; the implied plea for the redistribution of income; the need for "workers", those at the bottom in Mr. Cutajar's article, to unite and overthrow the "capitalists", those at the top; and finally the suggestion that Mr. Rhodes drown himself. One is led to believe that this latter proposal would solve all of the problems that Mr. Cutajar perceived to be present in Canadian society today.

Unhappily for Mr. Cutajar, I must disagree. I for one do not believe that mass violence or suicide would solve anything, save perhaps in eliminating some of the opposition to Mr. Cutajar's ideas. If my "radical" proposal means that I must align myself with John Rhodes "prefabricated sentimentalism", then so be it. The only way that social, economic, or political problems will be resolved in Canada today will be through negotiation and compromise. Violence breeds violence; it would be sheer folly to assume that the government would sit idle if guerrilla tactics were used to divide Canada. As well, the separatists would not be complacent if for example, our Armed Forces were used to keep Canada together. No, Mr. Cutajar, the way that this crisis of our Confederation will be resolved will be through talking with our fellow Canadians resident in Quebec. However, I will not be so idealistic as to state that there are few other problems in Canada. Yes, Mr. Cutajar, the distribution of income, employment, and the quality of education are problems. Big problems. But these problems pale before that of national unity.

I read Mr. Rhodes' statements in the Star and I for one am glad that he made them. It may have required a tragedy as great as that of the election of the PQ in Quebec to rouse a dormant patriotism (if Mr. Cutajar will forgive me for using that word) inherent in Canadians. The national unity organizations that have sprung up across Canada and indeed even in this university do not forget that their country is beset with other troubles, but they realize, Mr. Cutajar, that their country is not Canada without Quebec.

I await, sir, less of the knee-jerk rhetoric that can be had elsewhere. If the Varsity is the oldest and most respected institution of student journalism in Canada, as you repeatedly say that you are, then a positive statement on national unity is required, and the sooner the better. Yes, your drums of radicalism can once again be beaten, but only after the future of our country is secure.

Oppose "unity" and "independence" frauds

On Tuesday, September 20, 1977, Gerald Godin, a Parti Quebecois Member of the National Assembly in Quebec will be speaking at the University of Toronto. At the invitation of the Students' Administrative Council he will be speaking at 12 noon at the Innis College Town Hall on the subject "Quebec at the Crossroads."

This meeting is being organized at a time when the bourgeois news media is carrying out maximum propaganda around the question of the 'federalism' and 'unity' fraud of Trudeau and the 'independence' fraud of Rene Levesque. National hysteria is being whipped up on this question. The minds of the people are agitated about these questions, and people are concerned about what the future holds in store for them. It is in this atmosphere that the spokesman for the 'independence' fraud of Rene Levesque has been asked to speak at the U of T.

The bourgeoisie is sparing no effort to push this propaganda to the maximum. For example, as far as our own university is concerned, Gerald Godin is being invited to push the independence fraud of Rene Levesque, while U of T president John Evans is serving on Trudeau's 'task force on national unity' which is organizing a massive propaganda campaign on the national scale to push the federalism fraud of Trudeau.

The Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) takes an uncompromising stand towards the reactionary bourgeoisie and their state on this question. CPC(M-L) has pointed out that "Genuine Canadian unity means defeat of the federalism fraud of Trudeau and of the independence fraud of Rene Levesque. It means the defeat of the rule of the reactionary bourgeoisie and the U.S. imperialist domination." "Genuine national liberation for Quebec!" "Genuine independence, democracy and socialism for Canada!" Thus, the attitude of our Party on these questions is to resolutely smash up both frauds of the reactionary bourgeoisie which have been foisted on the people to divert them from revolution, and to mobilize the Canadian people behind the policies and plans of the reactionary bourgeoisie.

Some people are actively encouraging the people to support Gerald Godin, and the PQ stand. They are presenting the hoax that the PQ stands for the independence of Quebec. This is insidious propaganda to mix up the plans of the section of the reactionary bourgeoisie led by Rene Levesque and his group of reactionary cultural nationalists with the aspirations of the Quebec people for national liberation. The ordinary masses of the Canadian people sympathize with and support these aspirations of the people of Quebec. They remember the War Measures of October 1970, and the many times that the Canadian army has been used against the people of Quebec. Various agents of the reactionary bourgeoisie aren't trying to fool the people and are saying that by supporting the PQ and the demand for independence, etc. they are in fact supporting the aspirations of the people of Quebec for national liberation.

However, in fact, nothing could be further from the truth! Rene Levesque has time and again proclaimed his loyalty to U.S. imperialism, to the monopoly capitalist system. Soon after his election victory, Rene Levesque went to New York to reassure the U.S. finance capitalists of his loyalty to their domination. Many times he has spoken of the 'political' independence of Quebec while proclaiming that he will do nothing whatsoever about the rule of the rich and U.S. imperialist domination. This is because Levesque himself, is part and parcel of the reactionary bourgeoisie. The reactionary bourgeoisie has nothing in common with the aspirations of the Quebec people for national liberation, much less can they lead the struggle of the people to live free and independent of foreign domination. He is a sellout to US imperialism and a traitor to the nation of Quebec. Like all the ruling circles of Quebec in the past he has sold his nation down the river and taken up the interests of the subjugation of the Quebec nation and the oppression of the masses of the people. But, he is being portrayed as the saviour of the interests of the people of Quebec. This is how the bourgeois newspapers, etc. are fooling the people.

Trudeau is presenting the other side of the same coin. He is saying that the preservation of the country depends on the resolution of the question of national 'unity' in favour of confederation. Trudeau is presenting the hoax that the issue confronting the Canadian people is the issue of 'two nations' — the nation of English Canada and the nation of French Canada — and how they will live together in harmony and 'unity'. This is a sinister thesis to implicate the masses of the Canadian working class and people in the subjugation of the nation of Quebec by the Anglo-Canadian colonial state. Trudeau is pretending it is a so-called English Canadian nation which is the cause of the national subjugation of Quebec, and he is blackmailing the Canadian people into supporting his 'unity' fraud because, he says, the people are responsible for the subjugation of Quebec. This is a rotten hoax, one which is also being promoted by the revisionists and opportunists of all hues who are also repeating the nonsense that Canada is two nations. The fact is there is one country of Canada within which there is the subjugated nation of Quebec. The British conquered New France in 1760. They imposed their rule by force of arms, and imported their state to Canada in the 1790s, with the founding of York (now Toronto). What does this have to do with an English-Canadian nation? It shows that the cause of the subjugation of Quebec is the Anglo-Canadian colonial state, established as an extension of British Colonialism, and today dominated by U.S. imperialism. But all the two-nations theorists are trying to blackmail the Canadian people by saying they are responsible for the subjugation of Lengthy opinion pieces are acceptable after consultation with the editor regarding subject matter. Opinion pieces must be typed and double-spaced on a 64 character line.

Quebec, and therefore they should give up their so-called 'privileges' in the interest of 'unity' or else they should support the 'independence' fraud of Levesque to do penance. The fact is the Anglo-Canadian state is not only the enemy of the nation of Quebec, but is also the enemy of the proletariat and people of the rest of Canada.

Levesque, and the rest of the reactionary bourgeoisie in Canada are waging a whole campaign to channel the genuine democratic sentiment of the Canadian people into national and social chauvinism and to make them believe the issue of "language" is vital for the future of Canada. On the one hand, the federal government has presented the "Official Languages" policy as part of the federalism fraud of Trudeau and the reactionary bourgeoisie. The reverse side of the same coin is the promotion by the PQ of Bill 101, the "Charter of the French Language" in Quebec. It is the bourgeoisie as a class which is the cause of the exploitation of the people in Canada and which is the cause of the subjugation of the nation of Quebec and which is the assassin of the Native people of Canada. Rene Levesque is also part of this bourgeoisie and he is also attempting to split the proletariat in Canada. However the reactionary bourgeoisie strives to cover up these features of Canadian society with its propaganda that the main split in Canadian society is language, and that the cause of disunity in Canada lies in the question of two languages, or they push their counter-revolutionary theory of "two nations", etc. The reactionary bourgeoisie strives in this way to divert people from the path of revolutionary struggle against the main enemy, for the overthrow of the rule of the reactionary bourgeoisie and of the U.S. imperialist domination of Canada.

Both the frauds of the 'independence' of Rene Levesque and the 'unity' of Trudeau are hoaxes perpetrated against the Canadian people. With these hoaxes, the reactionary bourgeoisie is 1) sowing maximum confusion and disunity amongst the ranks of the Canadian people to keep the people from uniting in action against the common enemy — U.S. imperialism and the reactionary bourgeoisie, and 2) mobilizing the Canadian people into the dogfight in the camp of the reactionary bourgeoisie, to get the people to line up with one section of the reactionary bourgeoisie or another.

While Trudeau pretends that he stands for national 'unity', the fact is that the reactionary bourgeoisie is the greatest force for disunity in the country. The reactionary bourgeoisie is attacking every section of the people, and tries to pit one section of the people against another. This is the aim of the 'two nations theory'. This is the aim of the racist, anti-working class, anti-immigrant attacks which are being organized by the Canadian state through the anti-immigrant Bill C-24, through racist attacks, through blaming the immigrants for all the social problems in Canada, etc. It is the reactionary bourgeoisie which deprives the Native People of their hereditary rights, throws them off the land and deprives them of the means of making a livelihood, and then carries out maximum propaganda against the Native people. It is the reactionary bourgeoisie which is caught in the grips of the gravest economic crisis since the 1930's, and which is determined to make the people pay, by shifting the burden of the crisis onto the backs of the working class and people, through new unemployment insurance regulations, through the wages and prices controls programme which forcibly restrains the wage demands of the workers, through unemployment, rising prices, layoffs, speedups, etc., etc.

At the same time, the reactionary bourgeoisie is engaged in vicious infighting in its own camp. This is concentrated in the fight between Trudeau and Levesque on the question of 'national unity' and Quebec's 'independence'. This infighting in the camp of the reactionary bourgeoisie is intensified in the current crisis, and the rich are desperately trying to mobilize the masses of the people in the cause of the reactionary bourgeoisie and to take up the mission of one or another section of the reactionary bourgeoisie.

The Canadian people have no interest in either of the frauds being dished up by the reactionary bourgeoisie — neither the 'unity' fraud of Trudeau nor the 'independence' fraud of Rene Levesque. The Canadian people must unite to defeat both of these frauds, to resist the shifting of the burden of the crisis onto the backs of the people, to fight for the national liberation of Quebec, to fight for the immediate restoration of the hereditary rights of the Native people, to resist state organized attacks on the immigrants, etc. This is the programme of genuine national unity.

Only the proletariat, with its political party, CPC(M-L) at the head, can lead the forging of this genuine Canadian unity against the rule of the reactionary bourgeoisie, the U.S. imperialist domination of Canada and the monopoly capitalist system itself. Our epoch is the epoch of the revolutionary transition from capitalism to socialism. It is the era of imperialism and the proletarian revolution. Only the proletariat, with its Party CPC(M-L) at the head, can lead the struggles of the people to realize their aspirations. The banner of national liberation for Quebec, the banner of genuine independence, democracy and socialism for Canada is the banner

Male finds rape guilt still runs deep

What right do I have to talk about feminism and rape, being neither female nor a rapist?

My favourite analogy of the movement for women's liberation may clarify this. I see it as analogous to an assault or siege on a fortress: I'm inside, hoping that they get in. Who wants to be in a castle without any real women (those who are chained by stereotypes are, of course, inside as well)? It's a war on rigidity.

Speaking in terms of strategy, the current fascination, or concern — terms depending on your bias, here — with rape stands to hinder the movement considerably.

Nobody would argue reasonably that either sex can get along without the other, forgetting the gay extremists. The woman's movement is always being plagued by the guilt trips that men lay on them about how they are making the sexes distrustful of one another. Like a wife trying to convince her husband that she still loves him, even if the marriage needs to be re-examined, women are often diverted from the articulation of their position — their real task — by demands that they defend themselves against the charge that they are merely being antagonistic.

Before I am typed as one who has a stake in the argument, let me say that I, as a male, am a bleeding heart about it — although I will not accept all the connotations of the term. Like anybody with his roots in the liberal tradition, I enjoy an academic argument, especially if I care about what the outcome represents symbolically. Feminists should consider the potential damage done in making rape such a large issue.

Agitation for reform is not the problem: clearly, the victim must not be subjected to a cross-examination from the "defense" (one wonders, at times who is being defended, and who prosecuted) with respect to her character. But when the rhetoric of polarization enters the dispute, the agitation becomes counter-productive.

I'm not speaking from a deep background in the area, but I have a number of experiences that seem to correlate the conclusions that come out of the rarified and distorted student microcosm. In the course of coming to terms with their fears of oppression, women have often given vent to their terror of rape, mainly for its symbolic connotations. I know that when I'm walking on a street late at night, and a woman crosses the street to avoid me, she isn't necessarily assuming the worst, but merely taking precautions. But I've heard tales of women's absolute terror walking down a dark street with a male figure behind them, far away.

What is this leading to? I'm not sure; well nothing, really. Women fear men's physical strength, I suppose. And for a man, there is always the suspicion that after all, a woman harbors primal distrust for the male sex. Without being dramatic, "Rape!" is the primal scream of the woman's movement, the accusation that, in a sense, hits the mark dead on, but in another way is ludicrously paranoid.

"Bleeding heart" is apt in one special sense for my experience, and I think for that of many more: as with the abolitionists, I suspect, and civil rights sympathizers, the male of raised-consciousness may often have a deep streak of guilt. The inner ear of the mind hears the scream of rape all too clearly, knowing that he would never do it; this male is not exactly castrated, but is he ready for equality, ready to assert his rights?

There are many wonderful specimens abounding in this university of guilt-free but enlightened manhood; I'm not sure that I can make this same claim. But with the manifold weaknesses on both sides of the battle-lines in this "war," women should remember that when dealing with men who have something to lose (even chains), reminders of their guilt — beyond those that are necessary — are counter-productive, causing, not breaking rigidity.

Parrott to perch at U of T?

By ERIC McMILLAN

The Minister of Colleges and University is skipping U of T on his provincial tour of campuses to discuss new student aid proposals.

Harry Parrott will visit only Seneca College, a small community College located on the far-flung north-east fringe of the Toronto area, on his swing through Toronto in October.

Perhaps he needs an invitation to come to Ontario's largest campus? John Tuzyk, U of T student president, says the student council (SAC) is sending Parrott a letter today asking him to face U of T students.

Tuzyk said Parrott might be afraid to come here because "we could get a lot of students out for it," since students in professional faculties are most affected by the changes and U of T has the most students in these courses.

Parrott has yet to make an announcement on his student aid proposals. Speculation has it he'll announce the 1978-79 proposals on September 23 at Confederation College in Thunder Bay, his first stop.

Among the proposals which have been publicized so far are a requirement to force students to submit income tax forms when applying for assistance.

This has been called a "red herring" because summer earnings, or lack of them, are not considered when the amount of assistance is calculated. A third year male student, for example, is expected to save $848 towards expenses, ($768 for females) whether or not he had a summer job and no matter how much or little he actually earned.

The present system also assumes parental contribution whether or not the student's parents subsidize him, unless the student qualifies as an "independent." To be "independent" a student must either be married or have spent two years in the work force.

As the map reproduced here illustrates, approximately a third of Africa is at the moment embroiled in a variety of border conflicts, secessionist struggles and simple rebellions. In the case of Ethiopia, Kenya and Somalia, the fighting centres around claims which Somalia or forces armed by Somalia have made on the territories of the other countries. In Ethiopia, the Western Somalia Liberation Front (WSLF) is seeking to annex a large section of south-eastern Ethiopia to Somalia. In the case of Kenya and Somalia, the dispute is an older one. More than ten years ago the two countries signed a pact to end hostilities between Somali-backed shifta guerrillas and Kenyan border patrols over control of Kenya's north-eastern province. The Somalis, however, never renounced their claim to the province and clashes continued to take place despite the truce.

Nevertheless, until recently, relations between Kenya and Somalia were reasonably correct. The breakdown occurred when a force of 3,000 regular Somali troops attacked a remote Kenyan border post. The official explanation was that the regular troops had come in to help a group of WSLF guerrillas who had strayed or deliberately crossed into Kenyan territory. The guerrillas were presumably trying to make a detour through Kenya in order to avoid premature contact with Ethiopian troops.

In Nairobi, however, the official view is that the incident was another instance of Somalia aggression. Kenya's north-eastern province may contain oil and there are suspicions that the Somalis are after this.

Irrespective of the real reasons for the deterioration of relations between Kenya and Somalia, the deterioration must be viewed with delight in Ethiopia. The way things are going, Ethiopia may soon find itself relying on Kenya for sea and land links to the outside world. In particular, the Kenyan port of Mombasa may come into use as a shipping point for arms to Ethiopia. If such a request is made by Ethiopia, the response will necessarily depend on the state of relations between Kenya and Somalia.

Meanwhile the fighting in the Ogaden desert region of Ethiopia goes on without either side scoring a decisive victory. Official reports of casualties and damage are unreliable. Both sides for example claim to have shot down more planes than either of them had at the outset. The same problem exists with the figures given for casualties.

An interesting aspect of the fighting is that both sides are armed by the Soviet Union. This was also a feature of the recent clash between Libya and Egypt. President Sadat complained at the time that Russian helicopters had jammed radio signals between Egyptian pilots and their command posts. The pilots, flying Soviet-supplied MIGs, were engaging the Libyan MIGs. It seems however, that the Egyptians still managed to clobber the Libyans, which must have certainly come as good news to the embattled Chad government further South. FROLINAT, the Chad Nationalist Liberation Front, supported by Libya has all but expelled the central government from the northern part of the country. It was probably not just a coincidence that during the four day war between Libya and Egypt, in July, the Egyptians chose to deliver their main blow at Kufra, a Libyan oasis base that has been used to supply arms to FROLINAT.

Egypt of course can count on more than the Chad in any future battle with Libya. Colonel Moamar Gaddafi has turned President Jaafar Nimeiri of the Sudan into his enemy by supporting an attempt to overthrow the Sudanese leader. Sudan did not take part in the four day war but may do so if Egypt starts to lose ground in the next round.

The irony of the situation is that in Gaddafi, Sadat may be facing the ghost of his predecessor, Gamal Abdel Nasser. An airbase named after the late president was one of the targets on which the Egyptian air force inflicted serious damage. Sadat is seen in Libya as a traitor to the nationalist and "socialist" policies of Nasser.

Things aren't quiet in the Western Sahara either. The conflict there is between Mauritania and Morocco on one side and the Algerian-backed natives of the region on the other. The region in dispute used to be a Spanish colonial possession. Spain found it cumbersome and left Morocco and Mauritania to divide it up. The indigenous people, however, had plans of their own.

Last year while representatives from all the African states were meeting in Libreville, Gabon's capital, a unit of the Polisario Front — the group fighting for the independence of the Western Sahara — attacked Nouakchott, the Mauritanian capital. The attack was undertaken as a reply to Gabon's refusal to allow Polisario representatives in Libreville.

In July, a Polisario column attacked, for the second time in three months, the mining centre at Zouerate in Mauritania. Before the first attack in May, the centre accounted for 80 per cent of Mauritania's exports and averaged an export of 689,000 tons a month. In May this figure went down to 347,000 tons. To make matters worse the French technical personnel that formerly ran the mining centre have now left and refuse to return under present conditions.

The Polisario strategy seems to be to attack the weakest link in the Mauritania-Morocco alliance in the hope that Mauritania will abandon Morocco and leave the issue to be decided between Morocco and the Front. In this they are being inadvertently helped by Morocco which recently sent 600 Moroccan troops to Zouerate to help beef up the Mauritanian garrison there. Polisario strategists appear to be banking on the growing Moroccan presence in Mauritania to stir up nationalist sentiments strong enough to break up the alliance.

"extensive reading of Canadian periodicals." He said he has never read Canadian fiction. The extent of his travel as an adult in Canada is three trips to Toronto. At home in New York, he watches one Canadian television program, The King of Kensington.

Schoonmaker was quick to point out that the Expansionist Party does not plan an armed invasion or takeover. Instead, he cites the example of the peaceful cooperation of Europeans in the European Economic Community. The change from the bitter fighting of World War II, only thirty-five years ago, to the cooperation of today is a source of marvel for Schoonmaker. "I'd like to see what happened in Europe happen here," he said. He said it is time to abandon "parochial nationalism."

Schoonmaker said joining the United States would not mean abandoning the name Canada or the Canadian parliamentary system. He suggests that the new nation be called the United States of Canada, because "Canada" only means "a collection of huts". Further, he said, if Ontario joined the United States tomorrow, it would not have to abandon its parliamentary system. There is nothing in the Constitution to forbid the use of the parliamentary system in a state, he said.

To promote the cause of his party, Schoonmaker is asking his Canadian supporters to write to their provincial and federal representatives and to American magazines and newspapers, expressing their desire that Canada join the United States. He said that letters from Canadian addresses would have more impact than anything he could send out from New York.

Asked if he sincerely believed in the inevitable success of his campaign, Schoonmaker answered, "Nothing is inevitable in politics." He added, however, that he believes success for his party is nearly inevitable.

Newspaper articles published in the summer outlined the plan of the Expansionist Party to include many western, English-speaking countries in the United States. The idea so strongly suggests McLuhan's prophetic phrase, "the global village", that Schoonmaker was questioned about his ultimate goal and the source of his idea for that goal. The Expansionist Party chairman said he had not read McLuhan, but he remarked that the association was appropriate. He said his ultimate goal is world union.

Schoonmaker said he thinks "Canadians would enjoy being part of what they see on television."

Schoonmaker said he wouldn't want the United States to join the Commonwealth. "I can't abide monarchy," he stated. "We must work within practical structures. The constitution of the United States is practical; monarchy is not," he said. He added that monarchy is "okay if they want to make me king."

Schoonmaker quoted Thomas Paine to support his abhorrence of monarchy, saying that it is preposterous to have an island rule a continent. Monarchy has outlived its usefulness in modern countries, he said.

Currently, Schoonmaker works as a freelance word processor, revising legal documents. He is a graduate of City University of New York in political science. The position of chairman of the Expansionist Party may become a full-time job for him as early as next month, he revealed.

Shinerama shoeshines shine on

By GARY HOPKINSON

If the word "Shinerama" conjures up for you visions of pretty housewives in chiffon dresses singing about their new paste wax and dancing with dust mops in little square boxes, then you couldn't have been on, or in the vicinity of, Yonge Street on Saturday.

Shinerama is the National Campaign of University Students to Raise Money for Cystic Fibrosis (NCUSRMCF). For one day every autumn U of T students, along with other university students across the country, join in a giant, one-day shoe-shining blitz.

Here in Toronto, the Lady Godiva Marching Band led the way to shinier shoes, as it provided background music at Yonge and Wellesley Streets for the slapping and buffing of shoeshine rags. Local vanclubs from around the city donated their time and vehicles to transport Shinerama volunteers to Yonge Street corners.

The enthusiasm of the solicitors was, for the most part, met by a generous return on the part of the solicited. There were, however, occasional misinterpretations of the meaning of the event, as the following conversation recorded by The Varsity will attest:

Shinerama: Support Shinerama sir?

Unknown suburban type: What?

Shinerama: Support Shinerama, please sir.

U.S.T.: You religious cults really make me vomit!

Shinerama: But sir we shine shoes.

U.S.T.: I don't care what your Shinerama shoe shiners don't need shoes.

beliefs are! Why don't you go to church like the rest of us?

Shinerama: No sir, I don't think you understand... Look!

U.S.T.: What's that some kind of weird ointment or something?

Shinerama: No, it's shoe polish.

U.S.T.: Don't get smart with me sonny! People like you should be locked up... Bloody radicals!

By mid-afternoon, most of the volunteers were returning back to campus with a feeling of accomplishment. To help them celebrate, the Faculty of Nursing (or F.N. as it's known in influential circles) sponsored a Saturday evening pub in the UC Refectory.

*The fact is that in July, there were 878,000 people looking for work and only 61,332 job vacancies.

*Students and the public have been steadfastly blocked from participating in the preparation of a new national student-aid plan through three years of Federal-Provincial talks. These have failed to produce a new plan.

Dear Prime Minister,

I am gravely disappointed that your government has let unemployment climb since 1975, hurting millions of Canadians, when massive job creation, additional unemployment benefits and full compensatory student aid could have improved the situation of the unemployed, of whom half are students and other young people.

also
I ask that your government move quickly, with full opportunity for public and student participation, to establish a new federal student aid plan which operates on the basis of students' actual costs and resources, meets the unique situation of part-time students and is no disincentive to needy students.

Radio Varsity may be reopened

By HUGH STUART

Cautious but optimistic best describes the feelings of Student Council (SAC) Communications Commissioner Doug Gerhardt with regard to re-opening the Varsity Radio station this year.

"Because we lack both money and a game plan, a study group will be formed with the purpose of carrying out a top to bottom examination of the station's operation," said Gerhardt.

Therefore there may be little chance that programming will get past the experimental stage this year.

The station was closed down in 1975 while SAC backed Input Radio's application for an FM licence from the Canadian Radio and Telecommunications (CRTC). Their application was turned down because the CRTC felt there were too many vague figures. Whether it was a weak application or not is still a point of contention, but the important point is that the station's broadcasting facilities have sat idle for over a year. A detailed study of the station's operation was supposed to have been done last year. It wasn't because former SAC Communications Commissioner Tony Iarocci resigned.

Gerhardt and Communications Committee member Tom Simpson spent part of their summer examining the condition of the facilities. They concluded that a major expense will lie in the repair of the distribution system. The speakers at Devonshire House and New, Victoria, and University Colleges are in various states of disrepair and it is estimated they would cost $2,000 each to repair or replace.

In 1968 the operating cost of the station was $4,000. By 1975 it had risen to $22,500. Obviously one goal of Gerhardt's study group will be to find a way to reduce the station's previous financial burden on SAC, so that it can be reopened.

"Mismanagement of the station by some people who were on their own little ego trips," is Simpson's explanation for the high operating cost that had developed by 1975.

Therefore Simpson has recommended that an interdisciplinary team of engineers be formed to re-evaluate the station's operation because they could supply a fresh, objective

Oktoberfest, the traditional hops holiday held in various clubs and on university campuses about this time of year, will be a joint project at U of T this fall.

SAC's Sesquicentennial Committee is sponsoring the fun, and all the student councils and campus groups have been urged to participate. The Engineering Society is providing the beer, while the Food Sciences faculty will be selling sausages. The Lady Godiva Marching Band will be on hand to provide the traditional mug-thumping polkas.

Oktoberfest is being held on October 7 and because of Liquor License Board of Ontario restrictions, the number of tickets available is 2,000.

Entertainment and activities will include the tug-of-war competition between campus groups and games of chance for the wealthier among us.

SAC Orientation blast

By JIM TRAWN

Student Administrative Council (SAC) organizers are ecstatic over the response to SAC Orientation events over the weekend.

Over 1,000 turned out for SAC free films on Thursday, Friday and Saturday at Erindale, Scarborough and the Medical Sciences Auditorium. Friday's Jean Luc Ponty concerts saw capacity crowds at both shows, as did the Tri-Campus pub held Friday at Scarborough's Meeting Place, Erindale's Blind Duck Pub and Dr. John's in the UC Refectory. As well, approximately 200 people took advantage of the Varsity Blues-Blue Jays ticket offer.

This week, SAC Orientation events include a mammoth street dance on Wilcocks St. tonight at 10 p.m., Star Trek's Scotty at Convocation Hall on Tuesday night and David Bradstreet at Innis Town Hall on Thursday night. On the serious side, SAC is presenting Gerard Godin, a Parti Quebecois member of the National Assembly, at the Medical Sciences Auditorium at noon on Tuesday and a debate about the pros and cons of nuclear energy on Wednesday at noon at Hart House. As well, SAC is producing a series of Survival Workshops dealing with student aid, housing, sexuality and legal rights in the Sidney Smith mezzanine lounge during the week.

Another feature of the SAC Orientation Program involves the closing of Wilcocks St. in order to set up information desks for campus services and clubs. Noon hour musical entertainment will be provided throughout the latter part of the week on Wilcocks.

The SAC Orientation program concludes with the Roam-Around Dance at the Victoria College pub on Friday.

Ticket sales are brisk for those events requiring them. Tickets are available at all SAC offices and the SAC Info Desk in Sid Smith lobby from 12 to 2 p.m.

Athletic Complex underway.

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

"At present we're a long way from having the athletic facilities other major universities have," says Dave Copp, recreation co-ordinator for the U of T, but he feels the new athletic complex currently being constructed will change all that.

The building, located on Spadina Avenue between Harbord and Classic will become an extension of the existing Benson building, built in 1959, as an athletic building only for women.

According to Copp, there will be a variety of facilities available in the new centre, such as a fifty meter swimming pool, a wading, or "teach" pool, running track, and squash, basketball and tennis courts.

In a detailed outline of the building's facilities, Copp said the basement level will consist of two pools — the fifty meter pool for experienced swimmers and a smaller 16'x45' "teach" pool for beginners. These pools will be open to the general community, as will the rest of the facilities in the building, but the exact times these facilities will be available to the public have yet to be determined, said Copp.

Also on the basement level in the new complex will be change facilities for the general public adjacent to the "teach" pool, and a men's locker room adjoining the fifty meter pool. Women's change facilities and locker rooms already exist in the Benson building.

The large pool will have an observation deck seating a maximum of about four hundred people.

The ground level will consist mainly of athletic offices, but there will also be twelve squash courts: ten singles (18½' x 32') and two doubles (25'x45').

The second storey, known as the field house, will have a two-hundred meter synthetic surface track, along with pole vault and long jump areas off the main track surface.

In the middle of the track enclosure there will be four basketball courts, two of regulation size (94' x 50') and two slightly smaller (84' x 50') which will be convertible into tennis courts. They will be separated by nets to keep the ball in the appropriate court.

Also on the second storey will be additional office space, storage space, and mechanical rooms, along with three laboratories — for fitness, kinesiology and motor learning.

Construction of the new athletic complex was begun in the spring of 1977. Originally, said Copp, the U of T athletic department was told that construction would take twenty-three months. However, the electrician's strike has caused a delay in construction, and Copp said "We hope to be in it by the fall of 1979 — whether or not that's realistic, I'm not sure right now."

Copp described Hart House, which has served as the base for men's athletics at U of T since its construction in 1920, as "a beautiful building that can't be duplicated" but added "the number of students makes programming impossible. Last year, for instance, we could have handled an extra ten (intramural) basketball teams, but couldn't accommodate them." He called Hart House users' requests "legitimate — they all pay their athletic fees."

Copp warned, however, that even the new building could not satisfy all the athletic demands of the student population. "For instance, there's a great influx in the number of people playing squash. As it stands now, with about ten courts for 30,000 students, that works out to be one court for 3,000 students."

Copp disputed the theory that students needing facilities for inter-collegiate sport preparations would occupy the building most of the time. He pointed out that intercollegiate teams could only practice for a certain amount of time each week, "whether it be in the new athletic complex, or Hart House, or wherever." He said the new athletic complex would especially benefit those who play "the life-time carry-over sports, such as squash and tennis."

When asked if the physical education staff at the U of T would have to be increased because of the athletic centre's addition, Copp replied "eventually, but we're in a stand-pat situation right now."

The new Athletic Complex is slated for completion in the fall of 1979. Included in the new building will be: 1 — A fifty meter pool, 2 — public change rooms, 3 — a "teach" pool hundred.

Copp had few kind words about opponents of the project, stating they cost the U of T time and money. He said "the U of T had the approval and the money in early 1975 to build this athletic complex." Opposition to the project from many area ratepayers' groups, he said,

"delayed the inevitable and cost us more money. We built less building with more money — that hurts."

One concession the U of T did make was to shorten the height of the originally proposed building — down to 68 feet from the originally planned 87.

Copp said that the new athletic complex was a "common-sense, motherhood type issue — we're trying to improve the fitness of everyone."

Robin Campbell, co-ordinator of fitness at the U of T, agreed with Copp that the new building would allow for more widespread athletic use than ever before.

"Right now, we have a peak for recreation activities at the university — one from twelve o'clock noon until two in the afternoon and another from four to nine in the evening. Because of limited space at Hart House and the Benson Building we have to cut the peak off. With the new athletic complex we'll have a higher rate of use."

Campbell added the new recreation centre would add "more quality and quantity of programs." He said the U of T would be better prepared to host intercollegiate swim tournaments.

"The U of T has never had a big enough pool, adequate locker or recreation space. In a swim meet, we've had to use eighteen stopwatches. With the new athletic building, we're going to have electronic touch pads which will activate an electronic scoreboard."

Campbell says the U of T athletic department is "50 years behind in most equipment. The only way we can stay up to date is to see what goes on outside of this university campus. Most universities have added new athletic facilities and modern equipment in the last twenty-five years — we haven't. "If we stayed here all the time, we'd never catch up."

Campbell said the new building would add 209,000 square feet of gross usable floor space for athletics, but that 37,000 square feet were cut off by the reduction in height of the building from 87 feet to 68 feet.

According to Dave Copp, the U of T still will have proportionately less floor space for the purpose of athletics than most other Canadian universities. The new athletic complex will raise the average athletic floor space available per U of T student "from the present 4.5 square feet to about ten square feet." In comparison, Copp said, Laval University has an average of 42.2 athletic square feet per student (and a student population of 10,000) while Alberta's corresponding figure is 16 square feet and Waterloo's 13 square feet. Copp concedes that this is something we can never really do much about — we have so many students."

Copp concluded that the athletic centre is "a big boon for athletics" and will "definitely increase athletic involvement."

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

It may surprise many to realize that the need for additional athletic space at the U of T was first recognized as early as 1936 by U of T Physical Education staff, professors and students. At that time, the main athletic facilities (exclusively for men) were located at Earl House, which had been built in 1920 to serve a student population of only 2,500, and was considered then to have the most advanced athletic facilities on the continent.

In 1969, the sports facilities on campus were expanded with the opening of the Benson building, an athletic complex designed exclusively for the use of women.

But the student population continued to grow. In 1969, a feasibility study was undertaken to look into the possible development of a new athletic complex. Four years later, in 1973, a Task Force on New Athletics Facilities was established to consider the recommendations for a new athletic complex made by past users' committees.

That autumn, copies of their report were sent to employers' groups in the immediate vicinity of the proposed site, around Harbord and Spadina. Those citizens' groups were primarily opposed to construction of the "field house" north of Harbord Street. In December 1973 the Governing Council decided that facilities for the new athletic complex should be located on one site south of Harbord Street.

On May 30, 1974, an application was submitted to the City by the University for re-zoning of the athletic site on the south side of Harbord street, the north side of Classic Avenue and the east side of Spadina Avenue.

By the summer of 1970, architects were busy sketching the new U of T Athletics complex. In January 1975 the athletic complex received an exemption from the City's "forty-five foot" by-law. (The original proposal was for an 87-foot building, with 243,000 gross square feet. A revised re-zoning application was filed in April 1976 for a building of 66 feet in height and 208,000 gross square feet — the present dimensions.)

But there was opposition to the new athletic facility. A number of structures, including the U of T's criminology and mathematics buildings, as well as the former Ring Audio store and Great Lakes Institute plus ten university houses were slated for demolition. There were also charges by various ratepayers' groups that the university did not consult with the community. There were complaints about restricted community access and parking problems resulting from overcrowding around the new building, as well as complaints about its general aesthetic that it would segregate win conditions and block out the sun on the north side of Harbord Street.

One, recently, resigned SAC External Commissioner was quoted in the October 1975 Varsity as saying that the U of T was "the worst developer in town" adding that in a few years "students are going to wonder where all the housing went."¹⁹ The president of one area ratepayers' association wrote in the March 10, 1975 issue of the Varsity that the U of T was "unrealistic given the financial and political situation in which the university must operate for the next few years . . . ”

Also in March 1975, SAC held a referendum on the proposed new athletic complex. Over seven thousand students voted on the issue with a total of 5,745 students voting yes, and 700 voting "no", an overwhelming majority of 89 per cent in favour.

On July 6, 1976, the Ontario Municipal Board approved the construction of the U of T's new athletic complex, suggesting that "some attempt . . . be made to satisfy or arrive at a pleasing compromise aesthetically" with the neighbouring "ratepayers' groups" but "recognizing the impossibility of satisfying all tastes."

Ratepayers' attempts to appeal the decision failed, but construction was not started until the summer of 1977. In late April the Business Affairs Committee authorized that 12,415,000 dollars be spent on the building's construction and that the contract be awarded to Ellis Don Co. Ltd. of London.

Completion is tentatively scheduled for late 1979.

About 200 balloon-toting school children from schools in the downtown area gathered together at Varsity Stadium under threatening skies last Friday morning to join in a parade commemorating the opening of a new students' entrance to the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM).

The spirited group of youngsters was led by Toronto musician-composer Bobby Gimby who with his dixieland band guided them through a somewhat raucous and elongated rendition of Ca-na-da as they made their way across Bloor Street to the museum.

Metro's finest provided the small parade with an escorting party of two mounted police and a pair of motorcycle police, one of whom added to the excitement by falling off his horse before the troops even got rolling. Also in the parade were two of the popcorn vendors who have been ROM landmarks for quite some time. There was some doubt voiced by the onlookers as to who had established squatting rights first in front of the museum, the vendors or the equally famous prehistoric dinosaurs.

The new students' entrance represents part of the renovation and expansion program taking place at the ROM. It is designed to alleviate some of the pressures created by the 1,000 or so students who enter the museum every school day during the year. The new entrance is just inside the main door of the building and to the left. It will serve to divert the student groups from the main rotunda to the lower level where lockers have been provided for their use.

Varsity goes neo

A recent newspaper report on the present and future states of the press has sparked some reflection in these offices.

It was stated in last Saturday's Globe and Mail that the new technology — electronic aids which bypass the traditional "craftsmanship" operations of typesetting, layout and proofreading for example — and the effects of computerized advertising buying on writing and editing all have created a neo-new journalism committed to a non-verbal, informal writing style.

This means that people are now, and will be reading more of mysticism and the occult, "non-linear" writers such as Paul Rimstead and Martin O'Malley, and news stories whose content and style are determined by their degree of dedication to self-fulfillment.

At The Varsity we are not so affected by these considerations. Operations are almost all performed manually and by human beings instead of computer banks. In fact, seasoned journalists often come to our production nights to soak up a little of the "Front Page" ambience.

But in the event that, in some day in the misty future, the new technology enters into even our amateur realm, The Varsity has drawn up its five-year plan for automation and the "Me" generation. Exclusive details are revealed:

- a gossip column in which once great U of T figures are yanked from the past and presented in the harsh light of the present;
- horoscopes highlighting U of T figures, their fortunes and their foibles;
- great big pictures of U of T figures at home, on the job, and out doing their shopping.

That's where it's at. At The Varsity we live up to our motto: Always in the forefront of progressive journalism.

Children line up at popcorn vendor outside the Royal Ontario Museum. The occasion was a parade to commemorate the opening of the new students' entrance, part of the renovations now in progress at the ROM.

Keeps on tasting great.

Ustinov spars with Mackenzie Porter

By JIM EDWARDS

Resolved: that television is a destructive force in society.

Despite the gravity of this fecund subject, the theatrical wit of Peter Ustinov, renowned playwright, actor and novelist, and the pompous yet jovial snobbery of the Toronto Sun's Mackenzie Porter arguing for the affirmative, combined last Saturday to fill a Yorkville television studio with laughter and good-natured debate.

After a short introduction by Pierre Berton, host of The Great Debate, Porter began by presenting his own idea of the middle-aged television addict stereotype: an obese working-class man is "sitting in a battered armchair with puce-coloured upholstery" sipping a beer in an undershirt. His wife is standing behind him at the ironing board and "her plump pink bare legs are grossly mosquito-bitten."

Porter said that television is destructive because it "propagates widespread problems of obesity and debility by stopping people from exercising in fresh air." Television, he opined, is pernicious because it prevents people from carrying out chores like "painting the walls and decorating the windows."

Harping a trifle on obesity, Porter claimed that "fat women on the streets nowadays are as numerous as hippopotamuses on the Limpopo River."

He said the audio-visual medium mostly embodies "vulgarity that dull the mind instead of sharpening it. The intellectual and artistic level of the average show on television today is comparable to that of the pulp magazines a generation ago."

Porter went on to complain that "students cannot read or write properly" due to time spent in front of the television.

Porter added correctly, "I think that I shall lose this debate, because I'm a born loser, and because my thinking is fifty years ahead of my time."

Ustinov started with the humor and gusto that characterized the entire duration of his six-minute monologue.

"Can I give Mr. Porter two of my minutes because he's doing my job remarkably well. I think I ought to tell him that hippopotamuses on the Limpopo are a threatened species. They are not numerous at all."

The thrust of Ustinov's argument had to do with the benevolent influence of television in the world of politics. The close-up camera, he maintained, is the most effective lie-detector in the world.

"And since it is a machine which you can turn on and off, I don't see how you can blame it for half your difficulties; you must blame the weakness of human nature itself, which is the subject of another debate. At the same time television has had an enormous effect in making it impossible to have any more great men, which is good, because great men are a nuisance."

"I think that television, by coming close to politicians at times when they least expect it, does an awful lot of good because it put these people on the defensive all the time. For some reason it's the most prying eye. Senator McCarthy was upset completely not by Joe Welch, who was an admirable character but a rather mild one, but by television. When I watched the McCarthy hearings I didn't think that Welch would win the day, which he easily did, but I think he did it with the help of television. What really turned the tables was that McCarthy didn't realize the camera was on him instead of Mr. Welch . . .

"There have been even more recent cases of a bitter defence of personal integrity and Watergate became less and less convincing as the hearings wore on."

Ustinov then conjectured that if there had been closeups of Hitler and Mussolini delivering one of their hypnotic speeches, they would have appeared ridiculous and would never have been able to sway anybody. "The whole position," Ustinov said, "of the entire fascist party would have been untenable."

Ustinov, however, agreed with Porter on the stupidity of much North American television material, particularly the game shows, and advocated that parents be equipped with an ignition key to prevent their children from watching too much; a system, he said, which works quite well in France.

The Varsity — Ann Auman

of the proletarian revolution in Canada. In Canada, the youth are a great reserve for the revolution, a great source of revolutionary drive and initiative. For this reason, the reactionary bourgeoisie devotes a lot of resources to wiping out the youth, spiritually, culturally on all fronts. They are pushing these frauds of 'independence' and 'unity' down the throats of the students in order to divert the youth and students from the path of the revolution, and to hoodwink the youth into taking up the mission of the reactionary bourgeoisie.

CPC(M-L) calls on the youth and students who genuinely want to realize the aspirations of the people of Quebec for national liberation, the people of Canada for genuine independence, democracy and

Bell curve system repealed in new GPP document

By JEFF EDELSON

The U of T Governing Council, the top decision-making body on campus, has adopted a university-wide Grading Practices Policy (GPP). The proposal was generated late last year by the Academic Affairs Committee of the council, was recently approved by the Executive Committee and was passed by the full Governing Council last Thursday.

The policy deals with topics such as evaluation procedures, marks and the bell curve. The enormity of the recommendations in the document and the far-reaching effect they will have combined to make the GPP one of the most significant items on this year's Governing Council agenda.

The GPP discusses the obligation of university instructors to outline at the beginning of the course the bases of evaluation. Presently, informal descriptions of testing criteria and the relative weight of each are available in some courses, but the practice is not universal.

The new document, however, states that the instructor must inform his students of "the particulars of the method of evaluation to be used for that course. Once the weight for different assignments is explicitly given, it may not normally be changed without the majority consent of all students at a regularly scheduled meeting of the class."

The document also recommends that student marks be recorded in the university records in percentage form, but reported to students on their transcripts in letter grades. Allowance is also made for a plus or minus shading of the grade.

The bell curve system presently in use at U of T (a quota system that allows only for so many of each of the various grades) has been repealed by the new document.

"Each instructor is expected to use his/her best judgement in the assignment of the final grades," according to the document.

The GPP, however, does recommend that division heads and department chairmen appoint review committees "to review grades submitted by instructors and to ask for any clarification of any anomalous results, distributions or disparity and to suggest that the instructor reconsider the assignment of grades in cases it considers appropriate."

Student representative Brian O'Riordan says that the Students Administrative Council while basically happy with the document "criticizes the lack of appeal procedures, remarking and clerical checking of marks, citing the example of an arts and sciences student who last year was the victim of errors made in all three areas in the final assessment of his course performance."

Critic likes concert: what's his problem?

You would rather hear something that you like played by anybody, than hear something you like less played by a good artist if you're like most symphony fans; that probably goes for anybody, provided that the performance isn't too disappointing.

The occasion for this speculation is the Saturday Toronto Symphony concert. Because I'm willing to admit that criticism is the art of being constructively subjective, and my responses do not correspond that well with those of the audience, I have to be careful.

The Toronto Symphony, for those of you who don't know, is having a Beethoven Festival at Massey Hall, commemorating the sesquicentennial of the composer's death. The problem and the advantage of Beethoven is his strength as a composer; while many of his works are touchstones in symphonic, pianistic, chamber and choral repertoire, and therefore very popular, any fan at all will recall performances of quality, especially through record. Seeing even a fair performance of say, the Eroica, is akin to a religious experience after years of listening to discs, yet most people arrive with great expectations.

Spoil-sport that I am, I will admit that my response is hardly common, but use it anyway.

I find Beethoven's Violin Concerto to be an internalized experience. I can't see yelling bravo, at least until the tranquility one feels has worn off enough to permit breathing. And if I'm lost in dreamland, admittedly a far-from-objective position, I can't help but remark at the insensitivity of people who are yelling before the last note has even died away; were they just waiting, like racehorses before the bell, through the last bars, to show off their vocal chords?

But back to this internalized response, now that I've got Toronto audiences off my chest for the moment. Zukerman is a virtuoso who doesn't really need the technique to cope with most of this concerto; it's certainly not his style (or what I associate with it, stereotyping him). It's a bit like having a master play a simple piece: you know, if he has integrity, that he'll give it its due. The relatively tranquil opening movement has a lot of passion; that is, despite the sweetness and light of the solo part, the orchestra suggests that things are seething underneath. A lot of this is released in the last movement, which finally dances instead of standing there looking on (forgive the schlock). Zukerman managed to integrate a cadenza that might, if treated with egotism, be mere virtuosity. The cadenza is a problem in this work: how does one write something showy (the ostensible purpose of a cadenza) that fits into the almost anti-dramatic first movement? By making it an extension of this. Kreisler's cadenza, that Zukerman used, is showy, but releases the tension in short spasms of thematic material, leading finally to an extended passage preparing for the coda (close) of the movement.

The predominantly lyrical character (lyrical in the poetic sense of "lyric" (or) "dramatic") of the first movement makes the second movement — which is more lyrical — difficult. Zukerman solved that problem with his cadenza, allowing for the luxury of getting fully into the spirit of a movement of contemplative beauty (one definition of this term "lyrical", as opposed to dramatic, a structural beauty).

The last movement is more of the type that I would associate with Zukerman (think of the close to Mendelssohn's E minor, or Bruch's G minor): light, with an almost humorous sense of the dance in his phrasing. Not that it calls for his full resources, again, but it does require the rich tone that is more profound than words. All the restraint of the opening becomes buxom energy: dancy and cathartic.

The third symphony — Eroica — calls for a loud response. Any orchestra that undertakes this heroic work should be ready for catcalls if they fail to produce, and embraces from an enraptured audience if they do.

Klaus Tennstedt is the type of conductor who epitomizes the spirit of this symphony, as I see it. This is one of the great romantic works of art, right up there with Gericault's

The Raft of the Medusa, and Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads. You think as much of the revolutionary nature of the form, and the artist's historical context as you do of the work itself. Napoleon may have been the inspiration, but for most of us, Beethoven is the hero in this work. Tennstedt, besides looking Germanic, has a sensitive appearance, podium manner, and — the only thing that really counts — interpretive approach. When the artist is hero — as he was in the early nineteenth century — an emotive conductor is not only excused, but welcomed.

Perhaps in response to a rather negative write-up in one of the dailies, the horns seemed determined to match the inspired playing of the rest of the orchestra. This was not much of a factor in the first two movements, in which Tennstedt's attention to phrasing paid off in clarity that was not heard — not meaning to be redundant — in the concerto. Solo playing was especially good from the woodwinds. In the third movement, dominated by a horn trio, the most nerve-wracking obstacle was turned into a delight. This passage for horns sounds like the musical equivalent to riding a motorcycle along a tightrope: muscle with grace.

The final movement brought together the best of what preceded it: control, clarity, and individual skill to match the ensemble playing.

The next concert in the festival series — this Thursday through Saturday — features the return of Andrew Davis to conduct a dramatic program of the Leonore No. 3 Overture, and the fourth and fifth symphonies.

Cowpath capers conclude - intermeshed mosaic meets student, staff scenario

By ANDREW MAHON

It was a constant source of embarrassment — that stretch of unnegotiable path behind University College. It was the "North-west Passage" between the hub of the university (UC), and the rest of the campus. Unfortunately, it was either submerged by varying amounts of precipitation or sufficiently swampy as to give rise to various varieties of curious vegetation. Either condition was not conducive to large amounts of pedestrian traffic.

Students complained and wrote letters to The Varsity. The Varsity in turn complained and wrote letters to students — with no results. But now, as if by the benevolence of some mysterious paving magnate, a path has appeared. The new path, installed at the beginning of the summer, comprises a few hundred interlocking bricks. Each brick has 12 sides and forms with its rough hewn cohorts a firm and weatherproof matrix.

But are there any real advantages to the paved walkway? Of course. Studies conducted by an independent group show a definite time saving on this surface as compared with the swamp. In a series of authenticated time trials, officials recorded a consistent time-saving on a one-way trip between St. Mike's and Sid Smith. In fact, as much as .9 seconds has been shaved off the single-trip time, thanks to the speedy walkway. Experts agree that favorable wind conditions and low humidity could well boost this time saving to as much as 1.6 seconds in the not-too-distant future.

Elated UC officials plan to augment their "Swift Path Project" with a specially designed Zamboni. Purchased from Harold Ballard, this machine will re-surface the pathway after every lecture hour to restore an optimum surface for student traffic. Other innovations will bring a crack team of Brick Manicurists to UC with sensitive electrical equipment to check annually for fissures, structural defects, and quantities of llama feces.

Footwear specialists from Bata laboratories suggest that a low-profile, lightweight canvas shoe would be best for this surface, although some experts favor cleats in the more moist conditions. Of course, the serious commuter student could easily change footwear for this particular section of roadway and then return to his original shoes for the remainder of his trip.

Still, in the face of this rapid progress, one must surely wonder if the old UC swamp will be missed. The answer of course is no. However, as far as land-combat simulations go, the UC mudpath was a factual re-creation of landing conditions in Normandy during World War II. Its loss will naturally be a blow to the Combat Zone Restoration buffs at U of T.

It's also no secret that strategically-placed puddles in the swamp necessitated some innovative footwork by students. This in turn provided the choreography for some of Toronto's finest musical productions including memorable dance sequences from Mame and Annie Get Your Gun.

Disgruntled amateur air-sea rescue enthusiasts were quick to voice their displeasure when the old swamp was removed, claiming that they will be forced to move to the Arctic tundra in search of similar conditions for their activities.

But even amid the complaints and the current "save the swamp campaign," the new path lies in triumphant usage. In fact, plans for similar paths are already underway and students may soon look forward to attending classes in some of the most desolate territory in the world — territories like UC, previously inaccessible but now open through the magic of interlocking bricks.

Anxiety clinic to help at test and essay time

Essays and exams may be the last thing on your mind these days, but when that time rolls around, U of T's Advisory Bureau can try to help you out.

Psychologist Dave Graham and others at the bureau say they have seen too many students with anxiety problems and decided to do something about it. They've organized groups of eight to ten students to meet once a week to discuss their problems. Graham, an assistant professor at the Institute of Child Study says between 10 and 15 per cent of students become anxious about exams.

Graham uses what he calls the attentional approach consisting of relaxing and cognitive techniques. According to him, "the reason people do poorly in exams is because their attention is diverted from academic work to the physical feelings of anxiety and to worry". Students contribute to this anxiety, Graham continued, by asking themselves, "What am I going to do if I fail?"

Graham and his colleagues hope to get students to recognize where their feelings of anxiety stem from, eliminate them, and get back to the problem at hand.

The sessions last for one-hour each week for six weeks starting in October. The program has been operating for a year, but returns haven't been very good, Graham said. "Probably people are embarrassed that they get panicky about exams," he explained, but added that they should come to the bureau and "see that others have the same kind of problems."

The majority of students that have been involved in the program have found it very helpful, he said.

By HUGH STUART

The Varsity Rugger Blues opened their season Saturday with an impressive 42-0 victory over the Royal Military College "Reddies". On their way to a third place finish in the OUAA last year the Blues beat RMC 6-3; however it is difficult to decide whether this year's pasting indicates U of T strength or RMC weakness.

Front the start it was clear that the Blues had too much speed at forward and too much strength on the front line for the RMC squad. Charlie Singer scored twice (once for OSAP and one for John Evans) to lead the first half attack. Nick Beveridge, Bob Smyth, and Tom Fenton added single tries while Queen's University recruit, John Gibson converted one try to make the half time score 22-0.

The second half followed the same script as Beveridge and Smyth added their second tries while Gibson and Bob Seymour scored on long runs. Gibson converted two of the tries to make the final score 42-0.

It takes a total team effort to produce such a lopsided victory but there are some individual performances that must be mentioned. Smart passing by Derek Colaco directly led to two tries while long runs by Smyth, Gibson, and team captain John Gilmour kept the ball near the RMC goal line for much of the game. The front line also turned in a strong performance with George Gozynski deserving special mention for his work on the line ins. Finally there was the fine job done by Gord Kerr who, as scrum half controlled the tempo of the game very well.

Speaking for second year coach Neil Sorbie, former captain Neville Nankivell feels that this year's team has a good chance to be in the OUAA championship game.

"Our forwards are quick, we have a heady scrum — half in Gord Kerr, and a good deal of experience throughout," explains Nankivell.

There is one glaring weakness that was exposed in the RMC game and it lies in the Blues' kicking. Only three of nine converts were made and against a tougher opponent those two pointers may be the difference between victory or defeat.

A factor in the Blues' favor this year is certainly their schedule which leaves the games against strong teams from Western, Waterloo, Queen's, and last year's champ, York, until the second half of the season. The Blues have the talent to make a strong stretch run, and if they can peak at the right time they could bring home the championship. One thing is certain; the "Reddies" will not be their opponent.

There is another reason for optimism and it is the play of U of T's Second Rugger team. Since RMC did not send two teams on Saturday, the Seconds played the Toronto Nomad Fourth team. The Seconds' 40-6 victory was as convincing as the Varsity win. Karl Heck and Rick Cornacchio led the way with three tries each and Rick McNaughton added a seventh. Doug Brent converted all but one. There are many players on the Second team who are capable of stepping in if any Varsity players get injured. During a long season this is a necessity for any championship contender.

Finally it should be noted that rugger players would like to cast a shadow of doubt over the belief that this is Varsity football's one hundredth year. Their reasoning is that early football at U of T may have been rugger . . . which is a far superior sport anyway. Right?

CAREERS IN BUSINESS MANAGEMENT

Back to school. Exams. Christmas. More classes, more exams and graduation. And next . . .

Right now you are probably thinking about the past several years and what you have to look forward to after graduation.

While you're at it, consider the personal growth and satisfactions you could experience at Procter & Gamble — a leader in the consumer products industry. We regard training and development as our most basic responsibility because we promote strictly from within Procter & Gamble. We know of no way to train people to become managers other than to have them learn by doing.

Economics, history, psychology — our managers include diverse backgrounds. More important than your specific field of study are such basics as intelligence, leadership ability, innovativeness, and a solid track record of achievement.

Prior to on-campus interviews, representatives from Marketing, Finance, and Sales will be visiting your campus to answer questions and talk about their experiences at Procter & Gamble. Specific date, place and time will be advertised soon in this newspaper and at your placement office. The visit will be a one-day informal session in which all interested students can learn more about career opportunities in business management at Procter & Gamble.

As a first step, we invite you to visit your placement office and obtain a copy of our literature. Additional information is also available in the library file in the placement office.

Interfaculty Football Kicks Off Season

By JIM O'LEARY

One of the most hallowed traditions at the University of Toronto is the annual chase for the Mulock Cup. The Mulock Cup is the trophy awarded to the winners of the Interfaculty Football League.

Since the league's inception, interfaculty football has been divided into two tiers. The top four teams compete in the A division while the rest of the teams compete in the B division. A Mulock Cup is awarded to the winners of each division.

The 1977 version of the chase for the Mulock Cup gets under way this week as both divisions kick off the new season.

On the eve of the upcoming season it seems only fitting that the fans be given a preview of what they can expect to see in the interfaculty league this autumn. Unfortunately, time and space prohibit an analysis of both divisions. This article will therefore concentrate on the A division. A look at the B division will be forthcoming in the near future.

The new season kicks off with a new member in the A division. For the first time, Scarborough College will compete in the upper level of competition.

Scarborough's elevation comes after the suburban college completed an extraordinary 1976 campaign. The team went undefeated, allowing only 18 points, on its way to the B division championship.

Scarborough boasts a roster made up of 24 returning players. There is a starter returning to at least twenty positions.

This impressive list of veterans is headed by fifth year man Russ Henderson. Henderson, who has been the team's most valuable player and athlete of the year at Scarborough in past years, will start at a running back position.

Other notable returnees include quarterback Jim McLeod, defensive end John Zimmer and linebacker Fred Banswell. Coach Dellandrea is high on the McLeod-Henderson combination and is confident that the Zimmer-Banswell led defence will be able to keep getting them the ball.

Dellandrea can see only three or four vacancies in his lineup that need to be filled. The most noticeable of these is the gap at split end left by the graduation of Dan Dominico to the Varsity Blues. Dellandrea, however, claims to be blessed with the best crop of rookies he has ever come across in his years at Scarborough. From this fine rookie crop, Dellandrea expects to find replacements for the gaps in his lineup. One of the most impressive of these rookies is running back Rob Filliol.

Dellandrea feels his team has more than enough talent to win the title. Victory will therefore depend not so much on individual performances, but rather on team attitude and conditioning. To this end he has instituted a fitness program which must be passed by all players before they can play for the team. As for attitude, it is the coach's job to maintain the proper attitude among his players.

There were many in the Scarborough camp last year who felt their team was the best in the entire interfaculty program and could have beaten any A division team if given the chance. This year Scarborough plans to prove this point. This week should provide a clue as to the validity of these brash opinions.

The defending champions, Victoria College, find themselves in a different position than Scarborough. Victoria has already proven that they are the class of the interfac league. Their task is to withstand the challenge of all comers and retain their title.

Victoria's chances of recapturing the Mulock Cup will depend largely on their ability to recruit replacements for the many players missing from last year's team. The greatest priority seems to be in finding help along both the defensive and offensive line. To date the rookies have been conspicuous for their small size.

The strength of Victoria's veterans could be enough to overcome other deficiencies. Victoria has a lot of talent in their backfield. Led by the arm of quarterback Brian Boyd, the offense has the ability to strike from anywhere on the field. Running backs John Hobson and Dave Crombie give Victoria a potent blocking — running combination.

Not content to sit tight with a winner, Victoria has a new wrinkle in the offence they may throw at the opposition. The coaching staff has been experimenting with a wish bone offence. Opposition defences can expect to see this offence by mid-season if the Vic coaching staff can get it running smoothly.

Tough defense has been a tradition at Vic and this year should be no different. Bruce MacIntyre and Tom Potts return to anchor the defensive line. These two are well known and respected by opposition backfielders. The defensive secondary promises to be strong with the return of Bill Mithorn and Ted Yoshioka. Yoshioka has become notorious for this ability to come up with the big interception late in the game.

Victoria looks to St. Mike's as the team to beat to retain their title. In answer to suggestions that Scarborough was as good as any team in either A or B division last year, the feeling in the Vic camp is that they will have to prove it. As veteran Mike Webster put it: "They're crazy. There's no way they could have beaten Vic last year."

At the St. Mike camp there is a feeling of cautious optimism regarding the upcoming season. The runner-up in 1976 feel that with a couple of good breaks they could go all the way this year.

St. Mike's boasts an impressive list of big rookies to compliment their already strong team. The rookies should get a chance to prove themselves as there will be a few openings left by graduating players.

St. Mike's strength lies in its nucleus of seasoned veterans. At quarterback the team leader, John Leon, is returning. At halfback, Kevin MacKinnon returns. Many felt that MacKinnon was the best ball carrier in the interfac league in 1976.

Defensively, Al Hardy returns to anchor what is a hard hitting unit. In 1976 the aggressiveness of this unit earned them the nickname Papal People Eaters.

Predictably St. Mike's sees Victoria as the team to beat and has its sights set on dethroning the defending champions. With the size advantage St. Mike's possesses along the line, this does not seem like an unlikely task.

With the introduction of coach Glen Rosborough to the engineering squad midway through the 1976 season the engineers were able to turn around what was promising to be a dismal season. The Engineers are optimistic that after a full season of Rosborough's tutelage the Mulock Cup will be their's in 1977.

Engineering's hopes however, seem to depend on how well they can replace the offensive and defensive linemen that are not returning. The defensive line was especially hard hit by graduation which has forced engineering to look to the rookies to do the job this season.

The A division schedule gets under way on Wednesday as Victoria meets St. Mike's. Game time is 4:15 p.m. on the east field.

On Thursday, Scarborough meets Engineering at 4:15 p.m. on the back campus field.

Get out and support your team.

At quarterback, the Engineers are strong with the return of third-year student Sunil Tarneja. To compliment the passing of Tarneja is the running of Jim Renahan.

Surprisingly, the Engineers feel that Scarborough and Vic are the teams to beat to win the title. This may raise a few eyebrows in the St. Mike's and Vic camp but according to manager Albert Wong his team is especially wary of the power shown by Scarborough last year.

The 1977 chase for the Mulock Cup promises to be one of the most interesting of recent years. All four teams have to be considered contenders at this point in the season.

In addition to the long held and popular rivalry between St. Mike's and Vic, 1977 indicates the development of a rivalry between the upstart suburban campus and the three downtown squads. Scarborough College wants badly to show that their success in 1976 was not merely a result of poor competition.

The Engineers want to prove that their late season resurgence was more than a flash in the pan and that they are for real. St. Mike's wants dearly to dethrone their arch rivals from Victoria. And Vic will fight energetically to retain the symbol of interfaculty football supremacy — the Mulock Cup.

Football Blues Repay Old Debt

By HOWARD DEANE
and KEN WHITEHURST

The Wilfrid Laurier Golden Hawks are back in Waterloo plucking the lead out of their tailfeathers after being shot down, 17 to 13, by the Varsity Blues in a game played last Saturday at Varsity Stadium.

In the words of Varsity running back John Goodrow, who scored the Blues' 2 touchdowns against a fierce Golden Hawk defense, the game was "revenge, sweet revenge." In the final moments of last year's OQIFC western semi-final game, the Golden Hawks snatched victory away from the Blues and had handed them a 23 to 22 loss.

The Hawks almost repeated last year's performance. With 6 seconds left to play, the Golden Hawks ran their last play from the Blues' 1 yard line, but Bruce Pollock and Robin Rushton teamed up to halt Laurier half back Phil Colwell inches from the goal line to stop what would have been the winning touchdown for Laurier.

The highlight of this difficult game was the receiving of Chris Kotsopoulos. "Kotso", as he is affectionately called by his teammates, did not score, but he was a constant threat for the Hawk defense.

He caught 7 passes for 163 yards, including a spectacular 64 yard reception at the end of the first quarter. His play helped to loosen up a very tight Laurier defense.

The Hawks started the scoring mid-way through the first quarter. After being nailed 15 yards for a roughing penalty, the Hawks went 76 yards in 5 plays to score their first major. The convert was unsuccessful. The missed extra point later proved to be costly.

Early in the second quarter, after Kotso's spectacular catch, the Blues ground out 35 yards for their first touchdown. Mike Sokovnin, Varsity's All-Star Tackle, banged the ball between the uprights to give U of T the lead, 7 to 6.

Both an interception by Laurier's

Mark Forsyth and a scintillating sack by Toronto's Ray Zaremba provoked no scoring, and, at the end of the half, it was still 7 to 6 in favor of the Blues.

Laurier's first punt of the second half was blocked and recovered by Zarko Budisavijevic, one of Toronto's alternate offensive linemen who plays on the special teams. His fierce play started a drive that climaxed with a 37 yard Sokovnin field goal.

The Golden Hawk's second touchdown came on the first play of the fourth quarter after a drive aided by 30 yards of Toronto penalties. After the convert, the Hawks led 13 to 10.

Toronto's next play of the game saw John Goodrow testing his arm rather than his legs. Varsity quarterback Dan Feraday pitched out to Goodrow, and as the defensive backs closed in to guard against the run, the back tossed a wobbling 23-yard pass to Kotso. This drive, however, was halted by a strong Laurier defense, and the Blues were forced to punt.

The Blues took the lead on their next series of plays. Dan Feraday ended the drive with a 23-yard pass to John Goodrow in the end-zone. Speaking about this play, after the game, Goodrow said, "that was a new play, I'd never run it before in a game. While I went deep, Kotso squared off his pattern and took the defenders with him. That left me open." The extra point was good. The Blues now led 17 to 13, which was the game's final score.

With about three minutes left in the game Laurier started its last try for the precious 5 points that they needed to defeat the Blues. Because of two muffed converts, a fieldgoal was not enough to win or tie the game. The Hawks missed the conversion after their first touchdown, and an offside penalty cost them a 2 point conversion attempt after their second touchdown. Instead, after the second touchdown they had to settle for a 1 point conversion. Making either one of those conversions would have given them a chance for a tie and making both of those conversions might have given them the win.

The game was such a cliffhanger that the referees were uncertain about whether time had, in fact, run out. They conferred about the problem, decided the game was over and the Blues ended up on top.

The Blues have a promising rookie in Tony D'Agostino. He started the game in place of defensive halfback Jim Mossop, who was out of the game because of a shoulder injury. D'Agostino showed promise as a kick returner using his agility and finesse to elude Laurier tacklers.

The Blues total offense was 302 yards compared to 332 for Laurier. Varsity passed for 215 yards and ran for 87, whereas the Golden Hawks passed for only 57 yards and ran for 275. Penalties assessed were close with Toronto penalized 5 times for 55 yards and Laurier 7 times for 79 yards.

The winningest, yet least supported team in Toronto hits the road this week and will play Saturday, 2:00 p.m. at McMaster.

Big Plays Are Key

By JIMO O'LEARY

In the final analysis the outcome of Saturday's game was decided by the Blues ability to come up with the big play. Laurier dominated play along the line of scrimmage throughout the game. The Hawk offence rolled up an impressive 287 yards along the ground while the defense stopped Varsity's running game cold.

John Goodrow, who only one week earlier had run wild against Waterloo was held to a paltry 54 yards on 17 carries.

In a game that could have easily been lost, the Blues fortunes were salvaged by the fine play of quarterback Dan Feraday and receiver Chris Kotsopoulos. Time and again when the running game was stymied, Feraday turned to Kotsopoulos to keep the offense going. Kotsopoulos responded admirably. The final statistics showed that he had seven receptions for 163 yards.

What the statistics do not show is that many of these catches were of the remarkable variety. Despite being the victim of double coverage throughout the game Kotsopoulos continually got open and made the big catch when it was needed most.

Trailing 6-0 and trapped deep in their own end as the first quarter was coming to a close Feraday and Kotsopoulos combined on the first of the big plays which was to change the complexion of the game. On first down Feraday caught Laurier looking for the run and hit Kotsopoulos on a 65 yard pass and run play.

Instead of ending the quarter trailing and deep in their own end, the Blues found themselves in excellent scoring position. Pushed on by the encouragement from the revitalized throng of supporters, the Blues went on to score and take the lead. At the halftime break the score read 7-6 for the Blues.

Despite being badly outplayed in the first half, the Blues were able to take the field for the third quarter with a lead. Undoubtedly the strategy was to forget about the first half and go out and play as the game plan had dictated. The Blues however were unable to contain the wishbone offense of the Golden Hawks and by the fourth quarter the scoreboard showed a 13-10 Laurier lead.

With the Varsity running game floundering the prospect of a Blue victory was beginning to seem remote when Feraday and Kotsopoulos combined on the second of their big plays. On second down Feraday hit his favourite receiver on a long pass over the middle. Kotsopoulos went high and made a spectacular catch, despite being jarred by a vicious tackle.

Their spirits buoyed and with the leap of an timely Laurier penalty, the Blues were able to take the ball into the endzone. These six points proved to be enough to guarantee a Blues victory.

Despite trailing late in the game Tuffy Knight's Hawks were in position to pull off a last minute victory. Once again however the Blues ability to make the big play at the right time was the difference.

With six seconds showing on the clock the Hawks had the ball on the Varsity one yard line. With enough time for only one play quarterback Nelson handed off to Phil Colwell. The big running back had already accounted for 90 yards of the Hawks offence. As he headed for the goal line Colwell was hit solidly by defensive back Bruce Pollock and pushed back. The clock ran out and Blues left the field jubilant victors of a hard-fought game.

It seemed only fitting that it was Pollock who came up with the final big play of the game. It was Pollock who was the victim of a Laurier big play in 1976. With only seconds left on the clock Pollock allowed a Hawk receiver to get behind him and score the winning touchdown which knocked the Blues out of the playoffs.

Throwing is a popular sport at the University of Toronto.

The Blues were pretty lucky with it on Saturday's game against Laurier. They completed 13 passes for 21 tries.

The Engineering body throwers were not as lucky.

Body throwing at the Roman Coliseum on Bloor Street today would have impressed the Roman gladiators.

Bernie Gardner, a 21-year-old Centennial College student, was picked up and thrown among the engineering tigers.

Somebody missed him.

The potentially dangerous practise caught the attention of the nearby medic team who rushed Bernie to Toronto General.

He was released in satisfactory condition.

OSAP plan made plain

By KEN WHITEHURST

Students who take more than four years to complete their post-secondary education will not be eligible for provincial grants from the new Ontario Study Grant Plan (OSGP), a component of the Ontario Student Assistance Plan (OSAP), according to a statement released this morning by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

Students who are presently receiving grants from the provincial government will likely get larger ones from the new plan in 1978-1979 and they will be able to receive them without having to take the formerly mandatory $1,000 Canada Student Loan.

Eligibility requirements for the new plan are not likely to be less stringent than those for the grant portion of OSAP as it presently exists. Many people, however, who are now eligible for a provincial grant from OSAP will receive enough money from the new plan that they will no longer need the federal loan, which is also a part of OSAP.

Some present grant recipients will be ineligible for the new grant plan, but the ministry claims that this is because the eligibility criteria for the new plan will more precisely identify needy students. The eligibility criteria for OSAP loans will remain unchanged.

Realizing that professional and graduate students will be ineligible for the plan, the ministry announced that it will be expanding the Ontario Graduate Scholarship Program (OGSP). Professional and graduate students will continue to be eligible for the loan portion of OSAP.

Minister of Colleges and Universities, Harry Parrott said, "The various grant and loan components of OSAP help achieve equality of educational opportunity for needy students. Ontario Graduate Scholarships reward academic merit, regardless of financial circumstances."

The value of Ontario Graduate Scholarships will be increased to $1,500 per term, a maximum of $4,500 per year, from $1,450 per term, a maximum of $4,350 per year, in 1977-78. The number of scholarships will be increased to 1,200 from 945 this year. The budget for OGSP for 1978-79 will be $5 million, whereas this year's budget is $3.9 million.

Parrott said that an appeals board will be established to evaluate student requests for additional assistance and to assist students already in the post-secondary educational system to make the transition to the modified OSAP.

That board may be ready for the first year of the program rather than starting operations, as the minister had previously stated, during the second year of the program.

Students will be eligible for Ontario Study Grants for eight non-renewable periods of 10 to 19 weeks each. A student can take a year off from his studies without affecting his eligibility, and most students will be eligible for four years if they use their eligibility periods at a rate of two per year. The eligibility periods start when students first begin post-secondary study.

Parrott hopes that these restrictions on eligibility will "encourage students to complete their studies quickly" and that the restrictions will "encourage a reduction in the length of time needed by students to qualify for some professional programs such as dentistry and law."

The same eligibility periods will apply for part-time students as for full-time students. Part-time students are not presently eligible for grants from the new plan.

Particularly needy part-time students, such as single parents, will be eligible for non-repayable bursaries from the Ontario Special Bursary Program, which is another component of OSAP.

The cost of tuition, books, equipment, instruments, living and travel, and medical insurance premiums will be considered when calculating students' eligibility for OSAP.

An applicant's part-time jobs, capital assets, investment and other income will be taken into account for determining need.

Parents' income will also be considered unless the student is married or has been working full-time for at least three years. A contribution will generally be required from the spouse of a married student.

The province will take into account a student's actual summer earnings rather than, as is presently the case, expecting a fixed contribution regardless of actual earnings. Part-time students must have earnings proportional to their availability for part-time work.

Applicants and their spouses or parents will be required to authorize access to income tax records to enable the province to verify statements concerning resources.

The province will spend $74 million on student assistance grants this year, and Parrott said that the 1978-1979 budget for OSGP will be "no less than the level of ex-

Forestry students: "unfair"

By BARBARA ANDREW

Students at the Faculty of Forestry feel they have been ripped off this year by the new course weighting system. The system has been implemented in such a way that Arts and Science courses receive significantly more weight than do Forestry courses.

The Arts and Science Faculty has laid down a figure of 480 weight units for a four-year degree. There are 20 credits making up the degree so each credit has 24 weight units. The Faculty of Forestry has set up their courses on the basis of contact hours, 200 for a Bachelor of Science in Forestry (B.Sc.F.). Every contact hour has a weight of 2.4 (480/200) so the weight of the Forestry course depends on the number of lectures per week.

A student can receive 24 weight units for a full Arts and Science course but Forestry courses receive 5, 9 or 15 units. The students feel that this inequality forces them to either take a larger number of Forestry courses to make up their required number of weights, or, take more Arts and Science or Engineering courses. Apparently there are courses in these two faculties which could be useful to budding foresters, but they would rather take courses from their own faculty.

The unfairness of this system has come to the attention of the Forestry administration. Associate Dean of the Faculty of Forestry, D. V. Love, stated that they are "in the process of re-examining the situation, the inconsistencies have been recognized." The whole problem has been turned over to the Faculty of Forestry Curriculum Committee and they may possibly change the weights of Forestry courses.

However, any changes would not be effective this year since the system has already been implemented.

Resignations and illness in the Forestry staff have resulted in the cancellation of several popular fourth year courses. It is not a big problem for the students, but again, they feel that they are being forced to take courses outside their own faculty to make up their required weight units.

Balcony Square bites dust

Balcony Square, Scarborough College's student newspaper, exists no more.

In an open letter from Mike Griffin, Scarborough College Student Council (SCSC) Communications Commissioner, posted in the college and run in the final issue of the paper appearing today, the Scarborough student body was informed that publication of Balcony Square has been "suspended indefinitely."

Scott conveyed his message with "deep regret" but attributed the paper's demise to "the need for more staff, more people to aid in the making of the newspaper."

Balcony Square, up until its suspension, had a skeleton staff of four — editor Dennis Schilling, managing editor Ann Holland, an art director and a photo editor, all of whom gave in to the demands of course work.

The newspaper has been in existence since the mid-sixties "in one form or another". Currently it has been publishing every two weeks. Producing the paper requires 200 man hours of work, according to Scott, and the work can no longer be satisfactorily shared by "four or five overworked and tired" people.

A meeting is being held at noon today to determine the paper's future. With "sufficient interest," runs Scott's letter, then possibly the decision can be reversed.

In an interview Scott said that while last year the paper provided "the only fair coverage of the shenanigans going on at the student council" (SCSC was accused of irregular use of students funds), this year with the new administration "there's really nothing to report."

Scott is concerned, however, with the use the paper's office could be put to.

"There's a great danger with the shortage of space," said Scott. "Right now the profs are being doubled and tripled up in offices. And the Balcony Square office is big enough for one prof."

Schilling himself is now working at the Scarborough College pub, a part-time job which he held as well as his duties as editor of Balcony Square. He made about $25 per week as editor-in-chief, and needed every penny from both jobs in order to support himself.

"It's unfortunate that not enough students wanted to participate," said Schilling. He held a meeting for paper volunteers last week, he said, and only four people showed up, all of whom had had no previous experience.

Schilling and his colleagues decided that their academic careers came first, he said, because last year the editorial staff all ended going from five courses to one in the course of the publishing year.

PQ spokesman under fire here

By ERIC McMILLAN

Gerald Godin came to U of T to speak of the Parti Quebecois "dream" yesterday but was faced with questions about the ailing Quebec economy, Inuit language rights and Maurice Duplessis.

"We had a dream" as students twelve years ago and the PQ is now realizing that dream, Godin told about a hundred people at the Medical Sciences Auditorium. Godin is a journalist and poet who defeated Liberal leader Robert Bourassa in the November 15 PQ victory last year.

Godin said the "two nations" of Quebec and the rest of Canada should join as "brothers and sisters" to resist the Americanisation of our cultures and country. Trudeau should be questioned not on Quebec or his wife but on the solutions to our "branch plant economy" according to Godin.

He came under fire, however, when he defended PQ leader Rene Levesque for running to the United States for financing. It was announced last week that Hydro Quebec will receive a $200 million loan from New York at an interest rate of 9.35 per cent.

Godin argued it's a fact of life that small countries run to Moscow, Peking or New York for financing and "air fare is cheaper to New York than to Peking or Moscow."

He also said Quebec is safeguarding its independence by "diversifying" its debts. Independence is more assured if money is owed to Japan, West Germany, France, Toronto and New York than if owed to just one source, he claimed.

The real threat to Canada is not from Quebec but from the "American elephant," he said.

Godin gave the example of how the PQ is handling American-owned insurance companies in Quebec.

"Signals" were sent to them to halt the flight of capital from Quebec six months ago, he said. "We'd rather deal with them than use force against them," he said. "We're not communists or socialists, we're social democrats."

A number of speakers in the audience questioned whether this represents an attempt to win genuine independence for Quebec. One person called it "running to New York with your tail between your legs."

Another member of the audience asked why the PQ government wanted to keep the Inuit Indians in Quebec from being educated in the language of their choice. Godin joked that "they're English Inuit," that is, they wanted to be educated in English.

A member of the audience who identified himself as being from Quebec told Godin he was dismayed the PQ was acting as if it had a mandate from the Quebecois for independence. He predicted the separation referendum would fail.

Godin said that if the separatists lose the referendum, another would be held. He cited the two referendums used to get Newfoundland into Confederation as a precedent. If the PQ loses the next election, they would probably continue as opposition, he said. "That's democracy."

Godin would not defend the unveiling by Levesque recently of the statue of Maurice Duplessis, the iron-fisted former premier of Quebec. A member of the audience charged Duplessis was a Nazi sympathizer in the late 1930's who passed legislation and used police against striking workers. The statue had been gathering dust in a basement until resurrected by the PQ because the previous Liberal and Union Nationale governments would not risk the publicity associated with Duplessis.

"Some people in Levesque's inner sanctum" decided to unveil the statue, said Godin who refused to attend the ceremony.

"Duplessis was not all bad, just 95 per cent bad and 5 per cent good," he said. The PQ should be judged more on its actions than on "two tons of bronze," Godin said.

Godin was introduced by Stephen Clarkson, professor of political economics, who said Godin came not as a propagandist but in order to carry out a dialogue.

The speech was sponsored by the Students' Administrative Council.

Ex-Pet disciple

By STEPHEN OVERBURY

Over a bowl of yogurt and an apple in the smoke-filled Arbor Room, Parti Quebecois' Gerald Godin was bombarded with questions from two of Canada's largest radio stations.

Only two hours before, Godin had come under fire at the Student Council (SAC) sponsored meeting in the Medical Science Building auditorium. The visiting spokesman was cordial to everybody, including those who chose to lecture him on world revolution rather than pose questions.

In an interview with The Varsity, Godin recounted his student days. He dropped out of the classical college in his home town of Three Rivers before graduating, he said, in order to work as a proofreader for the local newspaper.

"I wanted to become a painter. I needed the money: I wanted to live the Bohemian life in Montreal where I had some friends."

At 17, he said, he had been a staunch federalist. Whenever a debate on The Great Canadian Question surfaced among his friends, he always sided with the federalists.

"At that age I was a great admirer of Pierre Trudeau. He was one of the best minds of my generation. He worked on the magazine that had some truth — Cite Libre (to which Godin also contributed). I admired him very much. I was a disciple of Trudeau."

Eight years later, in 1963, the PQ member became an independentist. At the time he was helping launch the publishing company Parti Pris, "I began reading the guys who explained the independence of the third world... all nationalist leaders of the time. It changed my mind and gave me a new knowledge of what was going on."

At 23 he helped a young group of teachers from the University of Montreal found the publishing house. They started with $600. One of the better known titles Parti Pris published was White Niggers of America by Pierre Vallieres. "Pierre sent it to me by an underground courier while he was in prison. It was an international best seller."

While researching for CBC's Radio Canada, Godin published poetry, supported a splinter

PQ member Godin at Med Sci yesterday "Duplessis was not all bad, just 95 percent bad."

Lobby sees changes

By PHILIP LIBMAN

"For the first time in my twenty years here, I actually detect a happy atmosphere when I enter the place," exclaimed C. S. Churcher, Associate Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

To what possible campus place is Dean Churcher referring? Sir Sanford Fleming? The renovated part of University College? His office?

The place is Sidney Smith Hall.

Sid Smith has been the subject of "many changes and more to come," according to Richard Brott, special assistant to the Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The changes run from the physical, such as the installation of the campus newspaper boxes at the two main entrances of the building, to policy governing posters.

Brott and Churcher have responded to student and faculty complaints by attempting to "make Sid Smith a more comfortable place to be," according to Brott.

While these physical changes are important, it is the poster policy displayed on the lobby walls that leaves students worried about the whole policy concerning the free speech area and free speech itself.

This policy states that "all posters must be in English although other languages may also be used." To illustrate its use, this would prevent someone putting up a poster in Chinese which incites people to riot! However French is permissible.

Students interviewed said the policy was "ridiculous and absurd, since this is a free speech area, and that means free speech in any language."

Rule six of the policy states that "the Faculty Office reserves the right to remove any notice at any time for any reason or to alter its position of posting.

When questioned, Churcher said that the rule will be changed.

"If the right notice is on the right notice board, then it will not be removed." He continued, "This policy is designed to prevent posters which are insulting to some group or of a hateful nature from being put up."

Churcher stated that "just as people have the responsibility and right to put up posters I have the right to take them down." But, he said, "I'll need a reason to do it. It certainly won't be an arbitrary policy."

"As long as it does not offend the university and its community in some sense, the poster will stay up."

"And as for purely political posters, once we have the room, they'll have a place of their own."

"Before it was just a lobby," said Brott. "Now there is more here for the student than ever before. One of the lounge areas on the second floor has been made into a study hall, which is the only space for quiet study in Sid Smith."

And the food service has been expanded with rolling Stove taking over the fifth floor cafeteria. There are also more tables and chairs for people to enjoy a meal or a snack," said Brott. "And we are trying to get food service at night."

But it is the lobby that has received the most attention. "We now have the new SAC information counter, which is a good idea said Churcher." The tables for groups are now chained to the columns so that they do not block the pedestrian traffic, and to prevent theft. We now have seven tables, and if more are needed, then they will be provided, said Brott.

"More garbage cans have been ordered, but here the students are at fault, since they have been observed throwing their garbage on the floor if the cans were more than three feet from them. A little co-operation from the students would go a long way to cleaning up the lobby," noted Brott.

"We will be asking the Department of Fine Arts, for a few wall tapestries for the lobby, and perhaps murals for the study hall, and lounge area upstairs," said Brott.

"We have had three separate architecture companies and our own school come up with ideas for the lobby. Everything from a circular staircase to a fountain in the middle of the lobby have been recommended," said Churcher.

"Unfortunately, the building itself and the lack of funds severely limit us in our efforts."

"In order to cut costs, a timer has been put on the key-punch in the computer room, which will shut it off at 10 p.m. every night when the building closes," said Churcher.

The changes are to increase student use unless students should dare to put up a sign of an "events off Campus," under the "Rides and Riders" area. If you do that enough times you could be faced with a fine, or even legal prosecution. But as students have said, "Any student should have the right to put up a poster or notice without fear of an administrator or other official tearing them down."

Women denied membership

By ANDREW MAHON

When UC 1 (University College) intramural soccer team hits the field on Thursday afternoon, they will lose the game. In fact, UC is destined to forfeit all their future soccer games because two team members are ineligible for the team.

Sheila Lewis and Barbara MacKay, presently playing for the UC squad, are the two ineligible players. The Intramural Athletic Association rules presently prohibit women from competing in Men's Intramural Sports.

Coach Mark Josselyn of the UC team said that he saw no reason why the two women should not be allowed to compete. "They're both full-time students, physically fit and they attend UC," said Josselyn. However, when Josselyn went to the intramural office to ask if Lewis and MacKay were eligible, he was shown the minutes of the U of T Athletic Council meeting which disallows women from participating in Men's contact sports. Dave Cops, intramural sports co-ordinator said that the two players were ineligible since "there's a policy statement about who can play contact sports and who can't."

To change that policy, an emergency meeting of the athletic council is required. That will not take place until October 5th of this year. In the meantime, Josselyn has contacted the Ontario Human Rights Commission and says that "they (The Human Rights Commission) believe that there is a breach of human rights here." "They are prepared to back us," he added.

Sheila Lewis, left half for the UC team, said that "Dave Cops got a book out saying females shouldn't play because of injuries." Lewis explained that Barbara MacKay and herself had little alternative other than to play in the men's league since "women can only participate in a one-day soccer tournament."

MacKay complained of "a lot of sexism at U of T". She said she didn't think that the Athletic Council would change the rule about women in men's sports since "the U of T is not known for its precedents." "Even if the result is favorable, one third of the season will be over by then," she added.

Meanwhile, the two women are playing alongside the rest of the UC squad. Danny Palumbo, Canada Games soccer competitor, says that Lewis and MacKay are "better than 50 per cent of the other intramural soccer players."

Watching their first league game against Meds on Tuesday afternoon, Palumbo was dismayed to discover the UC players' predicament.

"Their techniques are correct and their teammates depend on them — they don't suck when they get checked like most 11th division guys," he said. "There's no reason why they shouldn't play," he concluded.

UC beat Meds 4 to 1, but as Sheila Lewis observed, "Even though we won the game on paper — we lost."

"I don't think there's anything wrong with going to parties. It's not my fault if Princess Margaret turns up. I can't just kick her out. Well, I suppose I could, but . . ."

ARE YOU LAZY?

Those who were employed during the summer will have forgotten the three and a half months of boredom they had to endure. Those who weren't so lucky will have either dropped out or if they could still afford university are busy getting the most education for their money.

Forgetting however, won't do anybody any good. Summer will come around once again in a year's time and so will unemployment.

Not that it is easy to forget.

With Statistics Canada reporting that youth unemployment rate passed 15 percent in August and with Harry Parrott announcing new restrictions on OSAP, there must certainly be a large number of people starting to feel the pinch.

Nothing could be deadlier than to act stoically and endure everything quietly. Those who are tempted to adopt that course should read the letter from Canada Life which is printed on the next page.

You will note that employers are certainly not keeping quiet about the situation. As far as they are concerned, if you didn't find a job during the summer, or for that matter after graduating, it's because you were either too lazy to find one or too finicky about selling encyclopedias. This, you will also note, is not just the position of one or two isolated fanatics trying to impress the world with their extremism. The slander of students as incompetents unable to find easily available jobs was adopted as an explanation for high unemployment by none other than the University and College Placement Association (UCPA).

Asked what the unemployment level was so high this year, UCPA president Wayne Gartley replied: "We think the answer, obviously, is that students don't know how to begin to look for jobs. If students are enthusiastic and know what they want, they can get their jobs."

Ruta Altraks, co-ordinator of the Metro Student Summer Employment and Activities Program commented that "many students don't really want to work because they figure either daddy will take care of the expenses or they're satisfied with going to the cottage or summer school or on holidays."

Leslie Henshaw, manager of the Seneca College student centre (or should one say employer centre) had a similar comment: "We're trying to create a positive image, but there are a lot of students who aren't making serious efforts and are just confirming employers' images of students being lazy."

That's what happens when you're unemployed. You lose your image. You may also lose your composure, as those students who did not have rich daddies to fall back on, will have found out.

The question is: Are we going to accept this arrogance without a protest or are we going to have some pride and shove it back where it came from?

We will see just how much pride students have in the next few months.

Who is paranoid? Feminists or Barcza?

The article in Monday's (Sept. 19) paper, entitled "Male finds rape guilt still runs deep" was of disappointingly low calibre for the Varsity. Even the headline is inaccurate — it should read "Male blames female fears of rape for his guilt".

Barcza's first major statement (paraphrased) is that, "the current (his word) concern . . . with rape stands to hinder the (feminist) movement considerably". First and foremost women did not begin worrying about rape only last week. This is a "concern" which goes back hundreds of years. Rape, strictly defined is an assault by a male using his penis as a weapon. However, in reality the word may be used to describe the way some men abuse their wives, or a grossly misunderstood NO during a date. Not all males accept the fact that no means NO! Rape is not usually a sex act — it is an assault, a physical attack. Obviously anyone who would be worried about such an occurrence is merely "paranoid".

In a rather ironic statement Barcza claims "The women's movement is always being plagued by the guilt trips that men lay on them about how they are making the sexes distrustful of one another." Barcza proves his own statement true. Worrying about rape, he says, will do "potential damage". In other words he is saying people try to make feminists feel guilty, and this is terrible — but keep the rape issue under your hats girls it makes the sexes "distrustful of one another".

Barcza states "In the course of coming to terms with their fears of oppression, women have often given vent to their terror of rape mainly for its symbolic connotations." Can a woman not be afraid of being physically attacked by an animal simply because of the act itself? The symbolic connotations particularly when related to human beings (borderline) makes the act ten thousand times worse.

Rape, which according to Barcza "is the primal scream of the women's movement", is not ludicrously paranoid. First of all it is not the primal scream of the feminist movement, secondly if it were it would be dead on. For thousands of years with few exceptions men have taken whatever they could from women and given little or nothing in return. We have not even allowed women their own sense of self. They are merely bearers of our children, preparers of our food, and satisfiers of our lust. Women today are trying to break out of this mold, an exceedingly difficult task. Even in psychological terms; for Freudians, women behave the way they do because they feel castrated and their wound bleeds monthly. With such attitudes deeply ingrained in our society the task of a feminist is that much harder.

Barcza is worried that liberal men might feel guilty if all men are tarred with the same brush. Well perhaps efforts should be made to beat such guilt, to rise above it, an act Barcza seems incapable of. If a woman can be brutally assaulted and we get off with a touch of guilt it is hardly an awesome burden. It is possible that Barcza might have to pay in some way to see his liberated women join him in his fortress.

In conclusion, Leslie Barcza has written a confused, contradictory and inevitably conceited article complaining to feminists because he feels a few pangs of guilt. It was probably persons of his ilk who urged the young girl in England not to charge her rapist, a Guardsman. This sort of "worrying about rape is just more women's hysteria" attitude prompted the judge to let the lad (rapist) off with three months suspended sentence. After all, imprisonment would damage his career. Ladies, Barcza generously allows you to liberate yourselves; if rape scares you toss off your fears — you're "ludicrously paranoid". Being neither female nor particularly understanding, Barcza should stick to music reviews.

Letters to the editor

AIEE!!

It never ceases to amaze us how you can consistently misrepresent the facts and publish innuendos and half-truths. Let us take the Monday, September 19th issue for example. (We won't discuss the previous three rags as we are at a premium for time, ink, paper and patience.)

We will start on page 7 (how you got that far without screwing up, we'll never know). In the "Shinerama Shineshine Shine On" article, we would like to point out the following errors and omissions:

- (1) Shinerama was a Joint Nursing-Engineering function.
- (2) It is not just a one-day event but occurs over a period of several weeks. Ryerson and the Chiropractic College had their Shineramas much earlier.
- (3) To our knowledge there is no such organization as the Lady Godiva Marching Band. The entity to which you are probably referring is the Lady Godiva Memorial Band (LGMB) which has been in existence under that name since the 1948-1949 Skule year. It is a clear indication of the Varsity's ineptitude that it has not yet learned of the correct name of the U of T's only official unofficial band in that band's 29 illustrious years of existence. In those 29 years the LGMB has never been accused of performing anything even remotely resembling a march.

On page 8, under the heading "Beerbrawl Brewing" the Varsity continues in the tradition it established on page 7. It came as quite a surprise to us to learn that Engineering was just another participant under SAC's watchful direction in Oktoberfest. Perhaps a more in depth analysis by your incompetent reporter is in order.

Moving right along on page 20 under the heading "Spectator given the heave-ho" the following points have to be made.

- (1) There were more than just engineers sitting in the east stands of Varsity stadium at Saturday's football game.
- (2) More than just engineering students were involved in passing up bodies during the course of the game. In fact the person "thrown" was not even near the engineering section at the time of his unfortunate accident.
- (3) Engineers do not waste their time passing around the bodies of male spectators.

We do hope this petty attempt at slandering the name of engineering students ceases.

Our "miniature" cannon would be pleased to provide a miniature bang in your miniature offices. This should be sufficient to provide miniature concussions to your miniature brains.

Aid plan woefully inadequate

The new student assistance program proposed by Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, appears to be another step in the campaign of the Davis government to make post-secondary education, once again, the exclusive domain of the wealthy.

Parrott promised "the new program will enable many needy students to finance their education without having to borrow money under CSLP." Let us not forget that Mr. Parrott also supported Darcy McKeough's corporate tax cuts in the mini budget while failing to oppose the increase in tuition fees with which we are all familiar.

The OSAP program is already woefully inadequate. It does not take into account realistic financial situations and ignores students who must contribute to family expenses. Harry Parrott's plans, however, will destroy poor and low-income students' chances of post-graduate or professional education no matter what the academic qualifications of such students. The new plans set an unrealistically low level of income for all-grant eligibility.

One's thoughts on the student assistance program turn from bad to worse when one considers what the future of student aid may well be. The McKeough-Henderson Report recommended much more restricted student aid and higher tuition fees. The methods being carried out presently may, I fear, lead to the total paralysis or elimination of student aid in Ontario.

No reply to job ad

It has been with real interest and concern that I have noted in recent weeks the comments with regard to the employment situation among University graduates. As a matter of fact, it prompted us to put our career ad in your paper, March 30, 1977.

However, it is with greater concern that we report that we did not receive one response. As an employer, citizen and taxpayer, it is baffling and maddening to see students crying about no work and yet when it would appear that an opportunity exists, it is ignored.

We do not think that one ad should work miracles, but under the "supposed" conditions we would have anticipated a reasonable response. Perhaps the problem is that the students can't read.

An answer for Ukrainian dissident Plyushch

The September 24 Varsity contains an article on a recent meeting in Toronto featuring Ukrainian dissident Leonid Plyushch speaking on the "Helsinki Human Rights Agreement." The meeting was part of a North American tour Plyushch is making as a spokesman for the Helsinki Monitoring Groups. The tour occurs on the eve of the October follow-up to the 1975 Helsinki conference in Belgrade.

The article "Dissident Speaks Out" contains a serious omission: It fails to report on the discussion period following Plyushch's presentation where this Ukrainian dissident did indeed speak out most vehemently. The discussion period opened with a contribution from a spokesman for the Trotskyist League (TL), Canadian sympathizing section of the international Spartacist tendency (iST). It rebuked Plyushch's evolution into a spokesman for Cold War anti-communism and presented the Trotskyist struggle against Stalinism within the framework of the defense of the gains of the October Revolution and its extension internationally through world socialist revolution.

crease trade to reduce unemployment, and some governments are scared and wish to obtain peace at all costs." He said the Soviet Union leadership is trying to overcome its fears by scaring others and must not be allowed to get away with not enforcing the human rights promised in the constitution."

This "dissident speaks out" with the most zealous, warmongering reactionaries in the west, who believe Carter's "Human Rights" Crusade is not doing enough to provoke war with the Soviet Union, who denounce "detente" as appeasement and demand more trade war and imperialist thermonuclear sabre rattling to bring "human rights" to Kiev and Leningrad the way they were brought by U.S. imperialism to Hiroshima and Nagasaki. While some capitalists benefit from Soviet trade, the capitalist class as a whole will not have full and unhampered access to the Russian "market" until market relations are restored to the Soviet Union through social counter-revolution, in which the remaining gains of the October Revolution embodied in collectivized property relations, are wiped out. These property relations constitute the foundation for building a socialist society in which all social oppression is eliminated. The capitalist class knows this even if Maoists, various social-democratic "state capitalists" and sundry Soviet dissidents do not.

Therefore, Trotskyists call for the unconditional military defense of these property relations and their extension into East Europe, China, North Korea, Vietnam and Cuba, against imperialist attack and domestic counter-revolution. But, Plyushch protests,

"When the Spartacists say in the case of war the Soviet Union has to be defended militarily, I want them to study the military power of the Soviet Union and their international policies... What weapons will they use against a thermonuclear war: pistols and hand grenades?"

We know where Plyushch will turn for his weapons: to the Pentagon and NATO. For Plyushch the "main struggle" is "between democracy and totalitarianism" and in that struggle there is little doubt that Plyushch will support "democratic" imperialism against "totalitarian" Stalinism.

At this point, Plyushch sneers, but it was the Stalinists and not the imperialists who killed Trotsky. No, this is false to the core. It was world imperialist war that laid to waste Russian land and industry and created such enormous difficulties for the Russian Revolution at its birth. It was world imperialist trade war and military intervention which tried to strangle the Soviet state in its infancy, a stranglehold that generated Stalinism. And it was the "democratic" imperialist powers who refused Trotsky asylum and hounded him from country to country. The assassin's bullet may have come from the gun of a Stalinist agent but the Stalinist degeneration of the October Revolution was the result of the pressure of imperialist encirclement on an isolated socialist revolution, the very forces of counter-revolution to which Plyushch appeals today.

Plyushch has not, of course, always been a spokesman for imperialist reaction. When he initiated his courageous fight for democratic rights in the Soviet Union, Plyushch did so not by repudiating the tradition of Lenin and October, but as a reaffirmation of that tradition. At his first news conference in Paris following his emigration from the U.S.S.R. Plyushch declared that "the savage persecution of dissidents in the Soviet Union is a shameful taint on the bright ideals of Communism." While Plyushch never reached the full and uniquely Trotskyist understanding of the need for proletarian political revolution to oust the Stalinist bureaucratic caste, revitalize Soviet power and open the road to socialist development, the iST hailed his liberation from Stalinist terror as a victory for the international working class.

But Brezhnev's "Psychiatric" torture chambers broke Plyushch's commitment to those communist ideals. Under the further pressure of exile Plyushch has made his peace with imperialism. The crimes of Stalinism and imperialism, in turning this brilliant scientist and fighter for workers democracy into a class traitor and imperialist whore, will be avenged by the world socialist revolution. We reprint below in full the remarks of the TL spokesman which transformed the Plyushch meeting into a debate between this tragic and wretched Cold War apologist and the programmatic heirs of Lenin and October, Trotskyism, embodied in

"I'm speaking for the International Spartacist tendency. As Trotskyists we understand the nature of Stalinist persecution. Ours is the heritage of the Left Opposition wiped out by Stalin and his henchmen because we fought for workers democracy. But comrade Plyushch, do you know what cause you are serving here? When you first left the Soviet Union and came to the west, we of the international Spartacist tendency said that if you did not systematize your socialist convictions, that is, if you did not come to a Trotskyist understanding of the need to defend the gains of the Bolshevik revolution against imperialism and counter-revolution — if you did not come to understand the need to fight to build a new Bolshevik party to lead the working class in the Soviet degenerated workers state in a successful political revolution against the bureaucratic usurpers in the Kremlin — if you did not come to such an understanding, you would become the witting or unwitting pawn of pro-imperialist anti-communists anxious to use the issue of persecution of Soviet dissidents as a justification for exploitation and oppression under capitalism. The only democracy the imperialists are interested in for the U.S.S.R. is freedom for capitalist exploitation. The Helsinki Monitoring Groups are seeking to use imperialism to gain the basic democratic rights they seek. But imperialism is using you, comrade Plyushch. Only the international working class led by a Leninist vanguard party can defend the gains of October and open the road to socialism by overthrowing the bureaucratic misrulers in the Soviet Union, China and the other deformed workers states and by carrying out social revolutions in every capitalist country."

Back to school. Exams. Christmas. More classes, more exams and graduation. And next...

Right now you are probably thinking about the past several years and what you have to look forward to after graduation.

While you're at it, consider the personal growth and satisfactions you could experience at Procter & Gamble — a leader in the consumer products industry. We regard training and development as our most basic responsibility because we promote strictly from within Procter & Gamble. We know of no way to train people to become managers other than to have them learn by doing.

Economics, history, psychology — our managers include diverse backgrounds. More important than your specific field of study are such basics as intelligence, leadership ability, innovativeness, and a solid track record of achievement.

Prior to on-campus interviews, representatives from Marketing, Finance, and Sales will be visiting your campus to answer questions and talk about their experiences at Procter & Gamble. Specific date, place and time will be advertised soon in this newspaper and at your placement office. The visit will be a one-day informal session in which all interested students can learn more about career opportunities in business management at Procter & Gamble.

As a first step, we invite you to visit your placement office and obtain a copy of our literature. Additional information is also available in the library file in the placement office.

Plan to be at our pre-recruiting session — no appointment necessary, drop in any time.

PROCTER & GAMBLE

New dean of A & S

By KATHY CANTY

Although most students will never have the opportunity to meet him, Arthur Kruger is the new Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Kruger, a straightforward man in his mid-forties, was formerly the associate chairman of the Department of Political Economy and the first principal of Woodsworth College.

He has been regarded by many as a progressive force behind Woodsworth College for the past three years. Kruger has been given credit not only for giving part-time students more clout within the university, but also for taking academic courses to off-campus locations like the General Motors plant in Oshawa.

Those "three years at Woodsworth were the best years I've had," he said. Kruger realizes, however, that he will not have as much freedom to act upon his own policies at the faculty where administrative and political pressures are greater. At Woodsworth there was "far more chance to be creative," he said. "It is harder to move the big ponderous machine here." While he might make only "marginal steps" at the faculty, he will be "making them for larger numbers of people," he added. This is the "last administrative post I will hold at this university," he said. He indicated that he would like to return to his academic work at the Department of Political Economy.

Among the issues Kruger will guide this fall is that surrounding the "New New Program" for Erindale College. At present a committee is examining this program which calls for greater restrictions on course selection. By the time of graduation, students would have to demonstrate some proficiency in both science and the humanities. While Kruger feels that the New New Program is addressing "real problems", he believes that it is not the job of the university to teach students basic skills. It is "better to insist that they get that proficiency in high school," he said, "by looking hard at admission policies." He said that he would be willing to start work now on developing more admission requirements for both the Erindale and the St. George campuses. These standards would not be imposed until four or five years from now, he added, to give secondary school students a chance to prepare for them.

In addition Kruger felt that "all students should be required to specialize in some field of study. This is not to preclude the study of other areas, he added. There should also be a maximum in the number of courses a student can take in a particular area. The university has a "responsibility to set a standard," he said, "as to what we will sanction as a university degree."

The chief role of the university is to provide students with a liberal education, said Kruger, but it must also have an eye on the job market. "In some disciplines it is possible to accommodate job aspirations," and these areas should be expanded to meet student demand, he said. Nonetheless the university must not be an "instrument of the job market." Important academic courses which are not job-oriented must continue to receive support, insisted Kruger.

So far the university has not suffered a significant loss of courses because of cutbacks, according to Kruger. "If cuts continue then the curriculum might really suffer." Enrolment will increase slightly between now and 1982, he said, but after 1982-83, enrolment will drop because of demographic changes. Knowing that this drop is coming, the governments are not willing to pour funds into the university, he said. The only way to deal with the problem of cutbacks, said Kruger, is to watch the way funds are spent very closely.

One of the biggest problems Kruger feels that he has to face in his new office is that of "making the college system work." At present the various academic departments within the colleges come under the jurisdiction of the Faculty of Arts and Science. The colleges, however, are seeking more central control over these departments. The problem is to "develop a new role in the late twentieth century for colleges built in the late nineteenth century," he said. Kruger did not give any specific suggestions as to how he would resolve this tension.

Another problem he will have to face is the adversary situation which has developed recently between the increasingly organized faculty association and Simcoe Hall. It "will make the governance of the university more difficult," he said. In the past Kruger has acted as an arbitrator in labor disputes. Industry faces the same problems, he said, and "we'll adjust to it the way everybody else has." So far, he believes, the collective bargaining of the faculty association has "not worked to the detriment of students." The "faculty is very concerned about protecting the quality of education," he said, for it affects their prestige as part of U of T.

"I do not feel that students should sit on tenure committees," Kruger said resolutely. This would put too much pressure upon the faculty to "pander to students." Moreover, a professor is "entitled to be judged by his peers," and "students are not the peers of professors," he said. Nevertheless, he condones efforts to "marshall evidence on the quality of teaching," during the meetings of tenure committees.

Kruger opposes the requirement that visa students pay extra tuition fees. Many Canadian students have been subsidized by other countries through scholarships, he argued, and "I have a feeling we have a debt to pay." Furthermore, Canadian students benefit by "rubbing shoulders" with students of other countries, he said. "Society isn't going to save that much money" by increasing the fees of visa students. "We're going to be the losers," he said. "Some of our best graduate programs are operated with students from other countries," he added.

Generally he feels that students are more apathetic these days than they were in the sixties. They are more "preoccupied with long range career opportunities," he said. Today's students are "more anxious about what is going to happen to them."

Outing club drops down Ramsey Wright Could be useful demo for exam-time

By JOHN CAMERON

Some students will do anything to get away from boring classes.

Five brave souls from the University of Toronto Outing Club (UOTOC) routinely practiced several bone-chilling, death-defying descents on the east wall of the Ramsey Wright building yesterday.

As several bewildered students watched the event, Daniel Stripinis, Yujin Pak, Joanne Gainer, Arthur Rotenburg and Dave Cameron slithered down the vertical face in a manoeuvre, using specially designed climbing ropes, that is known to all experienced rock climbers as the rappel. The strange event occurred before a small, noon-hour crowd of students, many of whom questioned the sanity of the climbers suspended eighty feet off the wall, by a thin nylon rope.

This was all a dry-run for a larger demonstration to take place today, at the same place, starting at one o'clock. You will be able to see what happens when a climber falls off the end of the rope during a rappel. Other elements of a rappel, including slowing down, stopping, traversing, and rescues, will also be shown.

HEALTH PRO'S AT WORK

"Why am I doing this type of work?" Dr. Dermot Grove-White repeated my question. "Why are we living? Should I look to do volume medicine to get more money?"

Dermot Grove-White is one of two doctors who runs the Medical Clinic of the Alexandra Park Health Centre at 64 Augusta Avenue, near the Kensington Market. The other doctor is Dr. Malkit Johal. The Centre's telephone numbers are 364-4107 for medical services and 364-2998 for dental care.

The Centre acts as both a unique learning experience for students in the Medical, Nursing, Physiotherapy, Pharmacy and Dental Faculties and as a needed service to the Alexandra Park area. It is funded in part by the Students' Administrative Council.

Student Input

"There is a continuing student input here," according to Grove-White. "There has been since we started as a store front clinic in 1968. Students have to be given a chance to relate to people in a community atmosphere, before all their altruism is drummed out of them. Much of the way the present medical training system is designed dehumanizes people. What many people who study medicine must learn to know is that they must get involved. 'Come on,' the doctor finished up, 'let me show you the basement here and then I'll walk you through the dental facilities. We want to set up a community-based alcoholic and drug treatment centre. Right now we still have yet to lower the basement floor." One of the policies of the Centre is to provide family-oriented medical care to the whole person. "When you deal with alcoholics you have to deal with the family," said Dr. Grove-White.

The Centre operates on a budget of over $100,000, most of which comes from OHIP. "Right now the medical facility can most definitely handle more patients," the doctor told me.

Dr. Grove-White has been a staff physician at Alexandra Park for over two and a half years. He is a graduate of the University of Dublin and took part in the U of T Residency Program in Family Medicine.

The Dental Clinic offers basic dental treatment under the supervision of Dr. C.D. Beierl, who is a University of Toronto Faculty of Dentistry member.

Bring Your OHIP

Due to the clinic's system of funding, it is important that people register with the clinic before they are sick. You may have received a clinic registration card in the SAC Survival Kit. When you do pay a visit to the Centre, don't forget to bring your OHIP number. If you have no OHIP, you will of course still be seen, but a small fee will be charged to help run the clinic. "In terms of students, we're one of the busiest teaching practices in Canada," the doctor smiled proudly.

SENECA COLLEGE MEETING OCT. 5th

Dr. Harry Parrott, the Minister of Colleges and Universities, will hold a Public Meeting to discuss the government's proposed new Student Programs at Seneca College, Wednesday, October 5th at 2:30 p.m. Seneca College is located at 1750 Finch Avenue East, in Willowdale.

The Minister has not been telling the Students' Administrative Council of the U of T (or other student councils throughout Ontario) enough of what they need to know of late. "He announces his plans and then switches them," SAC President John Tuzyk noted, "putting public meetings in remote places and announcing programs in such a way that students don't have adequate time to formulate a response."

"All of this demonstrates the need to have even greater student participation at the Seneca College meeting. The Minister should know we are here and we are concerned with the government's proposed Student Programs. The changes the government makes this year will substantially determine the shape of things to come in Ontario," Tuzyk said.

Throughout the past summer SAC took part in conferences and joint meetings sponsored by the Ontario Federation of Students to map out strategy for making an impact on the government's programs.

Dr. Parrott has said that his meetings with students "have always been very useful." So come on out to Seneca.

SAC INFO DESK

There's a new showcase in town: the SAC Information Desk in the Sid Smith Lobby on the St. George Campus is now open and going full blast. "It's wonderful," Colleen Flood, who staffs the desk part time from 12-2, said. "I've been so busy of late I've hardly had time to catch my breath. Selling tickets, answering peoples questions, telling people where the washroom is located."

The SAC Information Desk fills an important need. The Students' Administrative Council has plans to expand its information facilities at all three campuses. In providing a necessary link with people, SAC is happy to have another way of letting students know what is going on.

The Information Desk acts as a ticket outlet and as a fixed centre for special event presentations. It is an independent project, part of a joint effort between SAC and the Arts and Sciences Faculty to fix up the Sid Smith Lobby.

Should homosexuals teach?

Gays find friends at debate

By DOUGLAS CHAMBERS

"Ten years ago that subject was not even talked about," said one of the blue-rinse ladies coming out of Sunday's taping of The Great Debate: "That Homosexuals Should Not Be Allowed To Teach." Two years ago, for that matter, Charles Socarides, the New York psychiatrist who forced the American Psychiatric Association to poll its members on its decision that homosexuality was not a sickness, was debating whether homosexuality was a mental illness on the same program. His adversary in those pre-Anita days was Charles Silverstein, editor of The Journal of Homosexuality like Sunday's adversary, both gay and "out".

John Lee for the "nays" is an associate professor of Sociology at Scarborough College and a founding member of the Gay Academic Union at U of T. He was facing David Gauthier, Chairman of U of T's Philosophy Department. The debate was chaired by Pierre Berton in a set that looked like a cross between a church and a gold-rush saloon.

Gauthier began by conceding that homosexuality is not a sickness, that gays are not out to seduce schoolchildren, and that there is nothing the matter with homosexual teachers in universities. For that matter, there is nothing the matter with homosexual teachers in classrooms, he said, so long as they are not "out". The problem with them, from his point of view, is that as overt homosexuals, they provide bad role-models for children in a society interested in preserving heterosexuality.

Lee's prepared statement was not a rebuttal, as the format of the program did not allow for real debate until later. Armed with a lengthy list of authoritative studies, he pointed out that many great teachers and academics had been homosexuals and that homosexuals are certainly as good at teaching as heterosexuals. He went on to claim that homosexuals in the classroom provide gay students, who would otherwise feel oppressed, with an acceptable alternative to closeted misery, and that they serve to demolish the stereotype of all gays as "nelly swishes."

The going got heavy when Berton asked Lee whether he would accept known fascists or anti-semites in the classroom. Lee's unequivocal "yes" was based, he said, on Niebuhr's defence of democracy, that "man is good enough to make it possible and bad enough to make it necessary." Gauthier, a civil rights campaigner, was distinctly uncomfortable with that one, although he had said earlier that the presence of Jews in a Christian classroom — or Communists for that matter — is not analogous to the "out" gay situation, as neither Jews nor Communists would provide subconscious role-models for the children.

Lee identified such homosexually-oriented societies as the ancient Greeks and the Arabs with the suppression of women. Gauthier concluded with a quotation from Mill — that Socrates unsatisfied was preferable to a fool satisfied.

In the question period that followed, a disgruntled spectator remained unconvinced by Lee's claim that the word 'gay' had a 200-year-old pedigree in the homosexual sense, but the rest of the questions were for Gauthier. One query was whether children would unquestionably accept role-models.

In the end the "Nays" carried but with a reduced majority (47-10); Gauthier thus emerged the victor in the debate.

OCUA policy: forced busing

By JACKIE LONDON

Students may be arbitrarily "bused" to another university at an extra unassisted cost of some $1,800 if policy now being studied by the Ontario Council of University Affairs (OCUA) materializes.

OCUA, a body acting as an advisory buffer between universities and the government, predicted as late as a year ago that university enrolments would continue to rise by about 5½ per cent a year until the early 1980's.

This month the enrolment figures tell a chillingly different story: the threat of unemployment has reduced the rise in enrolment to 2-2½ per cent.

Hardest hit are the universities outside the large metropolitan centres; virtually unaffected are U of T and Guelph which together accounted for "first choice" for some 90 per cent of graduating grade XIII Ontario students.

In answer to the dilemma, OCUA Chairman William Winegard has put forth a formal proposal suggesting that "busing" be used, that is, that students be arbitrarily taken from "full" universities (in the large metropolitan centres) and put in "emptier" universities (those outside large metropolitan centres).

It is estimated that this would entail an extra cost of $1,800 per student. No proposal has been made to help "bused" students pay the extra cost.

Mr. Winegard has been sick for the last two days and is not available for comment.

Lakehead, Laurentian, Brock and Trent Universities will probably cease to exist if a policy advocated by U of T President John Evans at last week's Governing Council meeting is put into practise.

Until three years ago, the government allocated funds to Ontario universities according to enrolment. A freeze was put then on funds, which meant that whether the enrolment went up or down, the universities would continue to receive the same amount.

Next year, the freeze will be lifted and OCUA is studying ways in which this will be done.

The University of Toronto proposal is that over the next five to seven years, money be allocated according to "quality" (still undefined) rather than "quantity" which would preserve the outstanding programs.

Many educators believe that the proposal is being given favorable support since the boom in university growth in the 1960's caused too many universities to be built — and this might be a graceful way to retract on a few.

In addition, it is felt that such outstanding universities as U of T, McMaster and Queen's are a national resource and a source of pride to the country, and their high standards should be upheld.

Canada has 638,320 full-time and 198,700 part-time post-secondary students

LET THEM KNOW WE'RE HERE

*The fact is that in July, there were 878,000 people looking for work and only 61,332 job vacancies.

*Students and the public have been steadfastly blocked from participating in the preparation of a new national student-aid plan through three years of Federal-Provincial talks. These have failed to produce a new plan.

Dear Prime Minister,

September, 1977

I am gravely disappointed that your government has let unemployment climb since 1975, hurting millions of Canadians, when massive job creation, additional unemployment benefits and full compensatory student aid could have improved the situation of the unemployed, of whom half are students and other young people.

also

I ask that your government move quickly, with full opportunity for public and student participation, to establish a new federal student aid plan which operates on the basis of students' actual costs and resources, meets the unique situation of part-time students and is no disincentive to needy students.

SAC Women's rep slams Toike's sexism

By CONNIE FILLETTI

The Toike Oike (engineering faculty newspaper) is harming the faculty of nursing in that it gives the wrong idea about nurses, claims Carolyn Caldwell, Students' Administrative Council (SAC) Women's Commissioner.

Caldwell, who also is the SAC representative for the faculty of nursing, expressed concern with the "unjust and untruthful" reputation women in nursing have acquired through the Toike.

"There is a tradition between nurses and the engineering faculty and there is nothing wrong in getting together for outdoor activities and social events, yet I feel badly that nurses are not very respected," Caldwell said.

However, she believes nursing is making its name as a profession and will eventually make a good reputation for itself on campus despite the Toike.

Although Caldwell has no definite plans concerning the engineering newspaper and believes it can't be placed on a list of priorities, she stated that future consideration will be given to the Toike as she has received verbal complaints from women students about its sexist content.

Caldwell views the role of SAC women's commissioner as being one of liaison between off-campus groups and women at U of T.

"I would like to bring in ideas, activities and information about different off-campus groups to interest women," Caldwell said. She hopes to do this by holding informal discussion sessions every two weeks to which representatives from various organizations like the Rape Crisis Centre will be invited to speak. Caldwell expressed optimism about the discussion program, saying it was "going to go really well. There has already been good response to it. There is a great deal of potential in that area."

Caldwell also emphasizes the need for the SAC women's commission to work with other SAC commissions on its campaigns for women. She points to such SAC orientation events as the University College Film Festival being held September 22, featuring work by women for women as an example of such cooperation — in this case, with the SAC Services Commission.

Caldwell says she would not describe herself as a "radical feminist" although her title of women's commissioner has caused such insinuations to be made.

Her approach to the job is one of "awareness of what is going on in the women's movement." Caldwell also believes in making helpful contacts within the movement.

Although she sees a need for demonstrations on occasion, Caldwell fears this approach will "scare away women and men" and cause them to "scorn" the movement for women's rights. She stresses that women can accomplish "a lot" without demonstrating.

Concerning the Women's Studies program at U of T, Caldwell said it should "receive all the support it can." However, her commission does not yet plan to conduct any formal study of the program.

When asked about student reaction to a SAC orientation '77 ad depicting a drawing of a nude female, Caldwell confessed that the ad was "offensive" and caused her "extreme displeasure". She said she sympathizes with all those who objected to the ad and she has lodged a complaint, however, this turned out to be an informal complaint to a member of SAC services commission. No other action was taken or is planned.

Caldwell is particularly concerned that "susceptible first year students will get the idea that this (the ad) is what university is like."

Caldwell feels there is no one dominant women's issue her commission will be pursuing this year. Instead, she hopes to "get into a number of things."

Among the problems facing women she would like to explore are unemployment, discrimination and exploitation. Caldwell hopes the informal discussion sessions will provide a forum for these topics.

As SAC women's commissioner, Caldwell is concerned with the lack of response she has received from women on campus to date.

"We are trying to get more input from all three campuses. We would definitely like to hear from women. That's what we're here for. This commission is still young. If we are to take on any great depth we must have more involvement from women on campus."

Freedom of Information

By TOM RILEY

(CUP) — Secrecy. The withholding of documents. An iron curtain of secrecy clamped firmly against the prying eyes of the public, with no right to information that is collected and compiled on behalf of the people. Obsessiveness with secrecy that can only lead to distrust on the part of the people.

And where is this country that consistently denies its citizens the fundamental right to know what information its government is basing decisions on and why? Well, right here in Canada, as a matter of fact.

Exaggerated you say? No really, as there are no statutes on the books that say the government has to provide information to the public. It releases only what it chooses to release. In the House of Commons there are the 1973 guidelines for notice of motion for the production of papers. However, there are 16 exemptions under these guidelines (of information not available) and, as many an MP who has tried to get information can testify, they are so broad that requests are turned down daily. Access to information by members of parliament really exists only in theory.

Examples abound showing that information is being withheld on a grand scale and that the government only gives up what it decides is in its best interests.

In this past session of Parliament we have seen the Sky Shops affair, the Judges affair, the secret list of 21 (now there are even more lists, including one on federal NDP leader Ed Broadbent, who has wondered aloud what he has done to get on a list), Polysar, the Atomic Energy Canada Limited nuclear reactor sales kickbacks and the RCMP's covert operations against l'Agence Presse Libre (which led to the Liberals naming an RCMP inquiry after steadfastly saying an inquiry was unnecessary. The about-face came after RCMP Commissioner Maurice Nadon called for an inquiry and effectively defused the controversy in the House).

Recently, there was Canada's involvement in the uranium cartel price-fixing scandal. And, during that particular juicy case, the government in September, 1976 passed an order-in-council which prohibits any discussion of the documents involving the cartel and makes it an offence for any person with access to the documents to show them. The documents were available to only a few members of the government.

The justification? It was done, said the government, in the name of the people of Canada, to protect them and their interests. Yet, the documents are available to the U.S. Congress the U.S. courts and the U.S. press while here in Canada MPs cannot see the documents let alone private citizens, who might like to see the documents to decide for themselves on the actions of the government in forming the cartel.

These are just a few examples of the withholding of information in Parliament. In each of these cases the government can withstand questions from the Opposition because it forms the majority in the House and party discipline is very tight. The average MP votes according to the dictates of the party; free votes are very rare.

Yet, the problem of secrecy and the lack of access to public documents goes beyond Parliament. It extends to all government departments and agencies. What we can see is what the government decides we should see or wants to release.

That means the government of the day can manipulate information as it chooses to its political advantage. It also means the bureaucrats can continue to hoard information and build power. Civil servants who feel an issue should be aired often resort to the inspired press leak, breaking either their oath of secrecy or, if the documents have been classified, the period. The U.S. Freedom of Information Act allows for this access; the FBI has received thousands of requests for information and has released files.

Baldwin heads another group, the League to Restore Parliamentary Control, which has an advertisement campaign in daily and community newspapers across Canada asking

In August, Ferris called a press conference to release a report by University of Victoria Professor Murray Rankin which heavily attacked the government green policy paper. The Rankin report said "by the paucity of its analysis, the blurring of its stated opinions and the misrepresentations of the goals and practices of freedom of information legislation, the green paper leaves little doubt that legislation will not be forthcoming."

There are many issues involved in the freedom of information debate. These include accountability of governments and civil servants, what precisely the exemptions should be, the amount of time needed between the request for documents and their actual production and the costs of reproducing requested documents. However, these are all secondary to most observers. For them the central issue is the type of review mechanism to be used if a request for information is denied. The question is one of ministerial responsibility versus judicial review.

The government's green paper discusses five options for such a review: a parliamentary option, where the denial would be debated and decided in Parliament; an information auditor who would report to Parliament once a year on requests denied; an information commissioner with advisory powers who would hear cases and then report them publicly, but would leave final decisions to the minister; an information commissioner with powers to order release who would be able to study a case and order the minister to release the document in question after deciding that a case was valid; and an appeal in the courts.

The green paper rules out court appeals and an information commissioner with power to order release of documents. The document says these methods are inconsistent with the theory of ministerial responsibility and anything done to abrogate these powers would set a dangerous precedent at odds with Canada's constitution and traditions.

It is this very thing that information advocates strongly disagree with. They say any information legislation must contain a form of review removing it from the political arena.

But the proponents of ministerial responsibility say ministers are responsible only to Parliament and to the people. But this argument does not stand up because of cabinet solidarity and majority rule. And a case could easily be forgotten at election time.

And so the debate rages on. But it is still anyone's guess as to when legislation might be introduced. Still some observers have said the mechanism is now in gear for freedom of information legislation in Canada. Recent moves by the federal government show it will be as slow as possible.

Yet, governments can only benefit from being open with the people. Mitchell Sharp has said he thinks the government should pass legislation to show people how little information the government really is withholding. An interesting viewpoint in the light of recent events in Canada.

The Judges affair....

Official Secrets Act. It has been estimated that 80 percent of government documents are classified as either top secret, secret, confidential or restricted.

In the final analysis, the question

Conservative MP Gerald Baldwin (Peace River), long-time information advocate and crusader, says the end to secrecy must come because people are becoming increasingly disillusioned with people to sign the ads, which call for freedom of information legislation and more government accountability for the tax dollar. Baldwin says response to the campaign has been encouraging.

"Out of the way, you!"

becomes how can people make rational decisions if all the facts are not available?

The government has made some concessions and introduced a green governments and want something better.

He is not alone. Pressure for a good information law is increasing. Groups have sprung up across the

The campaign by the Canadian Bar Association is perhaps next to Baldwin's the most widely publicized of them all. At its annual convention in August, 1975 the policy paper titled legislation on Public Access to Government Documents which discusses legislative options. But the green paper is only a discussion paper and has no actual legislation in sight. Some observers predict none until after the next federal election, despite enormous public support for access to information.

..the secret list of 21

It is this attitude of entrenched secrecy and refusal to open up the dusty files which led to the call for a Freedom of Information Act. The demand is for easy access to all levels of government, and an independent review mechanism to the courts when a request for information is denied.

This is not to say that some information should not be exempt. Advocates of a Freedom of Information Act readily recognize that government cannot be run in a goldfish bowl.

However, any exemptions such as national security, international affairs or investigative files need to be clearly defined. For example, in the case of investigative files there is no intention to stop investigations by the police in ongoing criminal inquiries but a request for access by people when the file becomes inactive or after a certain time country in the last 18 months demanding that governments take action.

Based in Ottawa is Access, a Canadian committee for the right to public information which represents nearly three million Canadians. Access membership includes the Canadian Daily Newspapers Publishers Association, the Canadian Community Newspapers Association, The Newspaper Guild (all three of these groups passed resolutions at their annual conventions calling for enactment of information laws at all levels of government), the Canadian Labour Congress, the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Canadian Teachers Federation, the Canadian Nature Federation and the Canadian Association of Social Workers.

In addition to these groups and a host of citizens groups which have emerged to demand an information act, a non-partisan committee of MPs was formed in the Commons to push for legislation. Liberal MP Lloyd Francis heads the committee which includes Gerald Baldwin, Ray Hnatyshyn and Andrew Brewin. They hope to build a broad base of non-partisan support in the House.

association devoted an entire day to freedom of information. One event was a panel discussion between former Liberal cabinet minister John Turner, Nader, Baldwin, former Privy Council president Mitchell Sharp and Ontario deputy attorney-general Roy Callaghan, which was chaired by Justice Thomas Berger.

The discussion led to the passing of a resolution with only one dissenting vote. The resolution called for the enactment of information laws at all levels of government and it called for a review procedure in the courts where the government could show why a document should not be available for release upon request. This is a reversal of current practice where the individual or group has to show cause why they want a particular report.

In February, the Canadian Bar Association held a press conference in Ottawa after presenting its resolution to both the Justice Minister and the Prime Minister. Association president Boyd Ferris said the government had no intention of introducing information legislation and it was the Association's plan to actively lobby for such laws.

Where have all the houses gone?

By STEPHEN ELLAMS

To say that U of T's record in community relations has been inadequate would be laughably to understate the case. The university's conduct in the recent imbroglio surrounding the construction of the new athletic complex left nothing but bad feelings all around.

What incensed the local ratepayer's groups was not the complex itself but the high-handed, imperious way the university thrust it upon them. A complete lack of prior consultation gave the community the impression that nothing the local citizenry could do or say would be allowed to slow the U of T's stately march westward.

As SAC External Affairs commissioner John Doherty says, the university's approach to the problem is to determine "how to quiet the noise, not how do you deal with the problem."

The university is often referred to as a "city within a city", but to the predominantly under-privileged ethnic communities surrounding us it is an alien and forbidding city. Increasing tuition fees make it more and more difficult for the sons and daughters of these people to enter university. Universities are built and maintained by the common social wealth of society yet more and more it is only the children of the economically privileged and their parents who benefit from university education.

Of the sixteen appointive seats on the Governing Council none are occupied by community representatives; this fact alone is a telling indictment. The university is isolated from its community by walls of bureaucracy, its facilities and resources often denied to the very people who through their taxes support them.

Instead the university marches relentlessly on, its construction projects displacing families, demolishing buildings of historic and architectural value in the supposed interest of the people, and picking away at the all too delicate infrastructure of the downtown communities.

In the city's new Central Area Plan, which supposedly details the pattern of downtown development for the next twenty years, the Huron-Sussex area is zoned residential. The university has lodged a complaint against this, protesting that it will put the university "in a straight-jacket." There are plans to build further administrative and research facilities behind the Robarts Library in the early 1980's.

Perhaps it is too much to ask that these facilities be built on the suburban campuses, where there is space in abundance. Instead monolithic office blocks will sprout on the bones of tree-lined residential streets. Affordable housing will be destroyed to be replaced by expensive condominiums and luxury developments such as the Manu-Life building.

In partial response to these complaints the university commissioned a study in November 1976 entitled "A Study of the University of Toronto's Relations with the Local and Ethnic Communities of Toronto." This study listed the concerns of the community as follows:

- More practical research relating to the community and its problems.
- Professional help from the university, tutoring of disadvantaged children, workshops to train, volunteers to deal with local problems and language classes.
- More information about the university, its programmes, admission requirements, financial aid and student services.
- More involvement of the university in the history, cultural expression and development of the communities.
- Greater access to the university's facilities.
- More information about the university's problems and goals.
- More courses offered in communities.
- Active stand against discrimination.
- Special scholarships and bursaries.
- More active community involvement in the affairs of the university.

All of this sounds fine and the report itself is quite thorough, but its implementation may be entirely another matter. Little seems to have been done since the report was tabled and the university's reaction to legitimate community concerns can perhaps be better judged by a reading of an internal memo from Elizabeth Wilson of the U of T information services to the University's external affairs committee.

"Should it be agreed that relations with the city on the policy level are in need of improvement, I would recommend that several small programs be started by the appropriate staff member.

- a) "When the need arises, plan programs to enlist the support of members of the University community who oppose University policy in matters affecting the city.
- b) "Take all groups into our confidence early by inviting elected officials or civil servants to visit the campus to discuss important, upcoming issues. This occurs now but could be stepped up.

Towering monoliths like this are rapidly overtaking . . .

- c) "Encourage members of the University to speak out in support of the City when opportunities arise. If four or five times a year members of the university publicly supported a stand taken by the city, the City would be more sympathetic when opposing positions must be taken.

- f) "Provide opportunities for public officials to attract favourable press coverage as part of events on the campus — tree plantings, for example, or by giving the chance to take credit for accomplishments on matters which reflect favourably on the City and its university."

Such a cynical attempt to co-opt the local alderman and city-council reflect the "quiet the noise" mentality noted by John Doherty. It seems apparent that the university has little interest in grappling with the real problems pertaining to its community relations.

Even within the university attempts by individual professors and students to relate to the community are stifled.

Faced with this numbing indifference to community relations students may well ask what they can do to further the aim of fostering more free and open relationships with the surrounding communities. The Committee to Reform the University of Toronto (CRUT) was formed on November 9, 1976 (National Student Day). It was created by residents of Ward 6 and members of the university community to discuss shared concerns. Its purpose was to tackle some of the urgent problems outlined here.

CRUT is working towards a reintegration of the university into the community. It believes business practices of the university must be consistent with the values and interests of the surrounding community. It also advocates the appointment of representatives of citizens' groups to Governing Council and other administrative bodies.

CRUT also feels research projects should originate out of community concerns, and that full academic credit must be granted to students and faculty for involvement in community projects. In joint projects the respective functions of the university and community groups should be negotiated in a spirit of equality, according to CRUT.

Lastly, CRUT feels that tuition fees and other financial barriers must be eliminated so that all members of the community can have equal opportunity to benefit from a university education.

Sandford Fleming fire sparks fire prevention

By NICK WHISTLER AND MICHAEL KANTER

A report presented by Alex Rankin, Vice-President of the Business Affairs Committee of the Governing Council, to the Planning and Resources Committee on Monday revealed that last spring's fire at the Sandford Fleming building has sparked action on the fire hazard question at U of T.

The U of T fire marshal has inspected campus buildings and, according to Rankin, apart from "housekeeping" costs, the amount that is needed to bring the buildings up to today's building code standards is $4.7 million.

The importance of this sum was indicated by the chairman of the Committee, James Lewis. He remarked that fire safety expenditure is a new injection into the capital funds budget and had not been given even any thought previously. Electrical Engineering professor Stewart Lee's comment that he believes certain fire exits in Varsity Stadium had been bricked up to provide more change rooms was further grist to the fire prevention officer's mill.

In response to the safety issue Lewis proposed that $400,000 worth of "bridgehead financing" be made available to get things underway. Student representative Phil Ryan, citing fire prevention cost figures, suggested that $800,000 minimum was necessary for basic fire prevention (alarms and emergency lighting). H.C. Eastman, chairman of the Department of Political Science, said that the $400,000 was only a start for 1977-78 and that there was no more available funding.

Sonia Sinclair, government appointee to the council, asked if the residences were safe. William Lye, head of U of T Physical Plant, replied that $2 million was spent in 1968 which more than meets today's standards, as was evidenced by a recent court case adjudicated in U of T's favor.

Professor Kovrig wondered if this expenditure for fire safety would reduce the insurance costs. According to Rankin, who suggested that he might "need a private session" with Lewis (who is president of the Prudential Insurance Company of Canada) the difference in premiums would be "minimal".

A two-part motion was ultimately agreed upon with unanimous consent. First, the Planning and Resources subcommittee was to prepare a building renovation priority list and secondly, the $400,000 was to be made immediately available from university capital funds.

Another important item on the agenda was the provincial lottery. Eastman mentioned a university environment and resources research group led by Professor Kenneth Hare which wants $10 million to look into urban waste and resources management. A Child in the City project, with Professor Michaelson (Sociology), previously funded by Hospital for Sick Children, wants $3½ million and a project of the Faculty of Medicine and Chemical Engineering to train occupational health and safety workers also wants $1 million from the lottery. It was mentioned that these figures were unlikely to be acceptable and Professor Saywell, president of Innis College remarked that all these applications for funds from the same university would undoubtedly compete with one another. He also pointed out that "a university has a responsibility not to grab the most it can get."

Scarborough stables hope to offer cheaper services.

SAC-Scar steeds resaddled: SAC's business makes hay

By GEORGE COOK

SAC has gone into the horse business. Last May U of T's student's council (SAC) bought out the Scarborough College stables for $3,500.

The stables are nestled in the Highland Creek valley at the city's eastern limits. The barn has 12 stalls. Eight of the horses are owned by SAC. The rest are boarded by private owners on the condition that they may be used by the U of T Riding School, which operates out of the stables.

The stables were formerly owned half by the Scarborough College Students' Council and half by SAC. They were beset by financial problems at the end of last year.

"The stables were losing money each year," SAC vice-president Dave Jones said. Before purchasing control of the stables, SAC was spending about $5,000 a year to keep them running.

"Now we hope to break even on it," Jones said. A SAC subcommittee will manage the financial details. The day-to-day management of the stables has been taken over by Sue Grasser and her assistant, Ann Perrin.

"We're doing fairly well this year," Jones said. "We've cleaned up the operation."

The stables have shown a profit of $2,235 during the months of June and July. That money, according to Jones, will be funneled back into the operation.

Asked if there was a chance the stables could again lose money, Jones replied, "I really can't see that happening. I knew the operation could work if it was just given a chance."

SAC hopes to make improvements to the facilities and to offer cheaper service if the stables continue to do well.

"Any student can use it," Jones said. "It's a really unique service — one no other student council offers."

In the past the stables have suffered from a lack of publicity. SAC hopes to rectify the problem by running an extensive advertising campaign.

Ten ways to make a fool of yourself

By TED STAUNTON

In keeping with The Varsity's policy of examining issues pertinent to U of T students, our public service department to U of T students presents another in its series of articles on coping with the various pressures of academic life.

The department, composed of Grizzled Veterans Who've Seen It All Before, has in the past advised students on topics such as Time Wasting (basic and intermediate), Essay Deadlines and How To Get Around Them, and Burglary of Faculty Offices for Fun and Profit. Today's topic — Ten Ways to Make A Fool of Yourself at U of T: A Beginner's Handbook.

Why look foolish? The advantages are tremendous. If less imaginative people consider you one step above the cretinous level, you can do or say things in complete safety, things that would normally land you in hot water or a libel action.

Fall flat on your face a few times, carefully place your foot in your mouth when the right people are around, and you will find people smiling sympathetically, patting you on the head, and allowing you to get away with anything. Furthermore, if you do something right once in a while, it will look like an act of genius.

Obviously there are far more than ten ways to make a fool of yourself at school. However, the vast majority of these methods usually result in minor gaffes at most. Anyone can occasionally come up with a truly stupid word or act, but such lucky breaks can hardly be relied on.

Hard work, imagination and self-discipline are absolutely necessary for any consistent degree of foolishness. Remember, it takes a truly dedicated person to make a complete idiot of himself. Unfortunately, most students do not have the time to practise regularly. Therefore, in the public interest, The Varsity presents ten tested and guaranteed methods to make you the biggest idiot on campus. (This includes Erindale.)

Carry a large pile of loose papers into a Sid Smith lecture hall and spill them when you get half way up the stairs to your seat. In attempting to retrieve them, manage to crawl over or under at least four people. Apologize profusely. Sit on the cup of coffee you placed on your seat while you hunted for your papers.

Variation: A popular twist to this standard ploy is to wait till a class has begun to enter the room. Cross in front of the prof to get to a seat, and unload your books and papers right in front of him. Try to get your papers mixed with his. Blush deeply. Novices should remember to carry an adequate supply of rouge to aid in blushing situations.

Attend the first two months of PHL 301 (Plato), and then quit. Explain to professor and friends "It's all Greek to me."

Pick up an economics course two months late. Exit the class each day mumbling "Sure doesn't sound like geophysics!"

While in a public place, read with obvious interest, a Varsity story on the Governing Council.

Pick a fight with Tim Allen, offensive tackle for the Varsity Blues. (Note: this is recommended only for the very dedicated, or those looking to collect on their health insurance. Not suggested for beginners.)

While eating lunch at Wymilwood, buy a coffee and pretend to enjoy it.

People will begin to stare. To heighten the effect, walk over to the jukebox. Complain in a loud voice about the poor selection, then finally pick two Neal Sedakas and a Shaun Cassidy. Dance back to your seat saying "All riiight, get down . . ." etc. Improvisation is the key here. Also try to pick a table close to an exit. Patrons have been known to voice disapproval of music selections by dropping a table on the selector's head.

After a brisk workout on the Hart House balcony track, "forget" where you are, and step out of an oncoming runner's path by vaulting lightly over the inside rail and into a basketball hoop. Foil rescue attempts by getting your shorts caught on the lower part of the rim. Dexterity and timing are needed for this. The satisfaction derived from the move more than makes up for long hours of practise. This move should be part of the repertoire of any self-respecting professional fool.

(i) In a loud voice ask a reference librarian in Robarts why you can't find True Detective in the periodical index.

(ii) Trip on the carpet after asking the reference librarian why you can't find True Detective magazine in the periodical index.

(iii) Trap yourself in a cubicle in the washroom of your choice in the Robarts Library.

Nationalism course found depressing

By ROBERT LOF

Pol 315, Nationalism in French and English Canada, is a course relevant to Canada's current political situation. Professor Forbes, instructor of the course speaking to an overflowing classroom, at the first lecture last Wednesday, stated that the root cause of separation is the different views of Canada passionately held by the French and English. Forbes offered the view that English-Canadians are simply a generation too late. If we had understood Quebec earlier, he said, we may have been able to work things out but now the best we can hope for is to respond, "in a sensitive manner," to the issues as they arise.

Pessimism pervaded this first class. Forbes felt that the attempt to make a united Canada through the bilingualism program is a failure at this point and he sees further attempts as hopeless. Forbes also felt that Trudeau was a liability due to his inflexibility and "old-time involvement in Quebec politics." But he added there is no apparent alternative to Trudeau.

Forbes speculated on the possible ramifications of separation including political and economic upheaval and possibly even armed conflict between the French and English. Yet the purpose of this course is not to provide practical solutions to the problem, he said, nor would it address itself to the question of keeping Quebec in Canada. Rather, the course will "offer an outline to the history of the problems in Quebec, critically discuss general theories purporting to explain Quebec nationalism, clarify the two main forms of consciousness held by the leaders of the Quebec movement and the Federal leadership and examine principles of political theory as they apply."

There was a wide student mix at this evening class. The general sentiment of the class was that of sympathy for Quebec's national feelings but little understanding of them. All the students The Varsity talked to felt that separation was unnecessary and in fact not feasible on economic grounds. But again no alternative solutions to the problem came to anyone's mind. Bill Van Geest, a fourth year political science major suggested that the problem is really the inability of Western democracies to deal with linguistic or ethnic minorities. The tendency is for them to merge cultures "which naturally would cause a tremendous resentment by an ethnic minority as large as the Quebecois." An interesting example of this is the Parti Quebecois' difficulty in dealing with a linguistic and national minority, the Inuit.

Forbes, however, said that a change in the political or economic structure of a country would not affect the problem. He pointed out that, in fact, the USSR and Yugoslavia have similar problems. Actually linguistic and nationalistic sentiments appear in free market economies like Canada and Great Britain, socialist economies like the Soviet Union, and developing economies like India and Nigeria, Forbes said in an interview after the class. In fact only one nation comes to mind as offering an example of a multi-lingual country living in harmony and that is Switzerland. The Swiss seem to do it by a system of mutual self-respect, Forbes stated. Not every Swiss is expected to learn four languages; rather, a German-speaking Swiss moving to Geneva is expected to learn French and use it.

Forbes himself did his Doctoral thesis at Yale on French and English nationalism. He has spent five years teaching this particular course.

organization that later merged to form the PQ, accepted a post as writer in residence at the University of Ottawa and taught investigative journalism at the University of Quebec in Montreal.

One of the goals of the student movement in Quebec is free education, an objective proposed by Rene Levesque before he became leader of the PQ. Asked if tuition fees should be abolished, Godin replied that it should be done because it is the only way to really attain the goal of accessibility of education for everyone. "It is a social goal that I'm in total accordance."

Godin stated that his government hasn't done much for student unemployment. "We think that the basic solution to this problem is independence. By that, I mean the $12 to $15-million we have given Ottawa could go into solving the problems of young Quebecers."

Godin said there were no job programs at present for students. He would, however, like to see a permanent program established similar to the federal government's LIP project, but with tougher screening procedures.

He added that the PQ would do something before Quebec separates. "We'll have to use our imagination." Nor did he know if the abolition of tuition would have to wait until after separation.

Without the support of the youth, he said, the PQ is through. This is why we'll have to stay in very close contact with them. The truth, the drive and the ideas for the future will come from them."

Godin said that he never expected to beat Bourassa.

"It was for fun that I ran. I wanted to write a story for McLeans (Magazine) on how I campaigned against the Premier. We had 600 people working for us, 80 per cent of them young people — students."

He said the PQ was fundamentally a social democratic party.

"It (the party) is one which thinks that a coexistence between a state-owned sector and a capitalist sector can exist. You've got degrees (of that). We have experiments going on in Quebec. (We are) a progressive party, not rejecting the capitalist system, testing other ways in manufacturing and in social organization. We are open-minded to other ways of organizing the production."

Godin was at a loss to compare his definition of social democracy with any existing political situation. "We will try to invent a new chemistry for all these aspects."

When the topic of English commercial media surfaced, Godin replied: "One reporter asked me what I thought of Diefenbaker. I told him he should be stuffed and put in a museum with all the rest of the mummies. That's what the lead of some story will be — the irrelevant."

Conflict simmers on pub ownership

By ROBERT LOF

The friendly, casual Innis pub is the site of a conflict between the Innis College council and the U of T Services Administration. The disagreement arose over who controls the pub.

In its first year (last year) the Innis pub was "a financial bust due to inept business practices," according to Alex Malcolm of Food Services. The manager was replaced by an interim manager, Doug Waldie. Waldie is an employee of SAGA, a food services conglomerate, which has considerable experience on University campuses. Malcolm said, "He was hired to put the operation back on the rails."

Under Waldie's management the pub was still in the red for the first quarter (April 1 to Aug. 1) but it has been improving, Malcolm said. "We are confident it will move into the black now that it is operating full steam."

Waldie said "Prices have been gauged in order for us to break even." The beer is seventy-five cents and the coffee is thirty cents. Imported beer will cost you one dollar twenty-five. A sandwich with soup and salad and drink is about two dollars. The casual atmosphere would seem to lend itself to ripoffs but Waldie said, "Our summer pilferage was low and so far we have not noticed an increase this fall."

Interim manager Waldie is operating the pub with small business practices that seem to please the Food Services Administration. Malcolm said that they have "no plans for a new manager" because "the interim manager is doing a good job."

The Innis Council is not as pleased, however. Former council president Robin Holmes said, "The council resents the Food Services Administration not responding to the problems which they see and not clearly defining the role of the different parties involved, that is, the interim manager, the Innis Council and the food services. We do not resent Waldie but the relationship is awkward because of the badly defined roles." She added, "Doug as an employee of SAGA naturally must please them and the food services, not the Innis Council."

Particularly the council is concerned over who will decide on the new manager when and if this occurs, said Holmes.

Malcolm stated the process for determining a new manager: "First the job opening would be advertised among the university staff. If no one suitable arises, then food services would advertise externally through Community College placement offices, professional associations and personal contacts. Innis Council would also be invited to suggest candidates. After a list of applicants is made up I will meet with three or four council members to make a final decision." The final decision however is his and not the council's.

"Since food services is fiscally responsible for the Innis pub the manager will be responsible to us," said Malcolm. "Innis council input in running the pub would be through us. They can suggest anything at any time and as long as it is reasonable it will probably be implemented."

"The council's concern over the type of food and atmosphere are taken into account by food services but final decisions on policy is in the hands of food services," said Malcolm.

He also pointed out the biggest determining factor in deciding policy is customer demand. In other words, if there is enough demand for an evening meal service it would be implemented but otherwise not, regardless of the desire of the Innis Council.

Waldie said, "Our sandwiches are as good or better than any served on campus."

Innis pub food is prepared from scratch. "It's not a case of canned this or that," says Edith Jolly, the cook. "All soups and salads are made with fresh ingredients... no plastic food." She points out that "all the nutrition that was there at the start is still in it when eaten."

One response to changing diet habits of students has been the addition of vegetarian items. Jolly said it was her policy "to make one of the soups every day vegetarian."

CUPE gets stalled at U of T

Further unionization of the support staff at U of T does not seem to be at all likely in the foreseeable future, according to Art Risley, Ontario regional director of Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE). Risley recounted that CUPE sent a delegate into U of T to canvass support for unionization in 1976. The response to this measure "was not overwhelming," according to Risley.

"The management at U of T are fairly clever insofar as keeping up with current wage and benefit demands," said Risley on the reasons behind the complacency of U of T's support staff. "There wasn't enough interest at the U of T to merit any further investigation at the time," Risley said. "When people are ready to unionize they'll let us know. Until then, it's a waste of time."

Of the approximately five thousand employees that comprise the support staff of U of T, no more than four hundred presently belong to CUPE. These employees are members of CUPE Local 1230 (library workers) and CUPE Local 1222 (SAC workers).

Unhappy dep'ts to be relocated

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

The dark, dusty, southwest corner of the U of T campus hasn't been forgotten. Recommendations by the South-West Redevelopment Task Force established in January 1977, state that "academic developments be oriented towards the establishment of an Earth Sciences complex," while "non academic development should relate primarily to Student Services, components of the Campus as the Campus Centre project, and the Textbook Store."

The southwest campus site is defined by the task force as the area bounded by Wilcocks Street on the north, Huron Street on the east, Russell Street on the south and Spadina Avenue on the west.

These recommendations were published in August of this year after briefs were received from both academic and non-academic divisions in the university regarding future locations of these departments and services. The task force under the aegis of the Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council.

The earth sciences group complained that they are badly housed, often in locations remote from one another. The social sciences group said internal networks in their division were also weak.

Non-academic areas of the university, such as student services, made the same argument. At present, the Health Services is located primarily on the southwest campus site, while the Housing Service is on St. George Street and the Advisory Bureau on Spadina Avenue. The Career Counselling and Placement Centre is on Bloor west of Spadina.

Recommendations by the task force include three phases — the first phase consists of the "Relocation of the Departments of Geology and Geography to the southwest campus site, relocation of the Department of Sociology and part of the Department of Anthropology into Sidney Smith Hall, and the provision of the space for the services associated with components of the Campus as the Campus Centre project."

According to the report of the task force, phase two consists of "the relocation of the Department of Botany to the southwest campus site together with classrooms and general space including an amalgamated library and the consolidation of Student Services on this site."

The third phase entails the "relocation of the Faculty of Forestry and Landscape Architecture and the Institute for Environmental Studies to the southwest campus."

Randy Grimes of the Office of Research and Planning said "phase one could conceivably be completed by 1981, while phase two will take another two years and phase three another two years after that." The three phases could be completed in eight years, although both Grimes and Professor Michael Charles of the task force insist there is no definite schedule.

The task force also recommended that the Faculty Club, Department of Information Services, Department of Alumni Affairs and Campus Police stay in the northwest section of the site, while the Graduate Students Union, Department of Fine Art, Institute for the History and Philosophy of Science and Technology and portions of the Departments of Near Eastern Studies and Mathematics "be provided with alternative space if, because of their present central location on the site, it proves necessary to demolish their current space holdings."

In addition, the task force recommended inter-connecting as many of the existing smaller buildings as possible. The report said this would be preferable to the construction of a single structure.

Tariffs might mean jobs

By GRACE ANOBILE

The federal government could create at least 180,000 new jobs if it implements the proposals submitted at the South-Western Regional Conference held last Saturday.

Twenty representatives from the student unions of the University of Toronto, Western, Waterloo, Guelph and McMaster met at McMaster University to discuss a report made during the summer. A research team headed by Ann Forest of McMaster studied five manufacturing industries — auto parts, machines and equipment, shoes, television, and textiles — in south-western Ontario. The research concluded that Canadian goods manufactured in these industries are not competitive because cheaper goods are entering Canada from other countries.

"The study proposes that the Canadian government put high tariffs on incoming goods to protect Canadian industry," said John Doherty, Student Council External Affairs Commissioner (SAC), who attended the conference.

Doherty is also a member of the Ontario Federation Students (OFS) which is looking at ways of creating jobs in Canada. At last count, there are about one million Canadians out of work.

"We are looking at different solutions for creating jobs, especially for students. The study makes sense. The government should place high tariffs on goods from other countries to protect our own industries.

Germany and Japan look to their own and we should too," said Doherty.

"OFS has been calling on the government to do something about unemployment ever since 1972," he added.

PFS has proposed that the federal and municipal governments fund projects in which jobs would be created for students. They are community-oriented projects which would benefit different communities.

Labor Minister John Munro who was also at the conference said that the federal government is looking into the feasibility of subsidizing industries that would employ students. For every student hired, the government would pay employers one dollar per hour per student.

"We (OFS) are skeptical about this plan because the employers might not be creating jobs solely for students. They might have planned to create these jobs anyway," Doherty said.

The five areas of industry studied by the McMaster research team could create over 180,000 new jobs if the government makes Canadian products competitive on the market. By making foreign TV sets, shoes, textiles, machines and auto parts more expensive through high tariffs, the same Canadian products become the cheapest to buy.

When asked about even more government control in the economy through this proposed plan, Doherty said that finding students and unemployed Canadian jobs is more important than maintaining free trade.

PQ to follow Ontario lead in raising tuition fees for international students

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Quebec government is preparing to raise tuition fees in 1978 for international students to about $1,500, a senior official of Montreal's Concordia University disclosed recently.

The official, who did not want his name printed, said the ministry of education told Concordia officials the increase would not apply before September 1978.

Clement Guhaime, press attache to education minister Jacques-Yvan Morin, refused Sept. 12 to deny or confirm the report. He said no decisions or plans concerning a change in fees had been made. He added it would be a few months before any decision would be announced.

Differential fees are part of the Parti Quebecois platform. The platform says while "Canadian students indirectly fund their education through taxes, foreign students don't."

In an interview earlier this year, Morin brushed off the possibility of implementing fee differentials, saying this was "a file among so many others" that he had to familiarize himself with. But he said he was "very aware of what Ontario had done."

Ontario and Alberta have implemented differential fees for international students effective this month.

Concordia rector John Obrien said Sept. 12 that although nothing official has happened yet, he thinks the increase in "foreign fees will happen sooner or later. It could happen next September. Nevertheless, it will be because of government legislation," O'Brien added.

J. W. Tait, assistant vice-rector (liaison and admissions), said "it was anybody's guess" if and when an increase will take place. He said he was "a little hesitant" about the impact it would have on underdeveloped countries. "Third World students may be rethinking seeking a university education in Canada if these soar, which would mean a reduction in the number of educated people in these countries."

One third of all Canada's international students attend universities and colleges in Quebec. Five of the province's seven universities rank among the 12 Canadian universities with the greatest number of international students. McGill University has the highest percentage and numbers of international students in the country; Concordia ranks third.

Gov't statistics show over 15% students jobless

OTTAWA (CUP) — Students returning to universities and colleges this month are likely to be financially pinched, according to August unemployment statistics released by Statistics Canada.

The August unemployment rate for returning students of both sexes between the ages of 15 and 24 was 15.1 per cent. For students of both sexes and aged 15 to 24 who attended school in March but are not planning to return to school this month, the unemployment rate was 20.7 per cent.

Youth in general encountered a severe shortage of jobs. For men aged 15 to 24 the unemployment rate was 15.2 per cent; for women of the same age the unemployment rate was 14.4 per cent.

Unemployment for the Canadian work force stood at a high 8.2 per cent in August.

Good News For Scarborough

By JANICE KELSEY

Good news for all those desperate squash players who presently beg, bribe and book months in advance, for a chance to shut themselves in a small white room.

Due to congestion, Scarborough College is expanding its athletic facilities to include four new squash courts. This brings the total to eight. Scheduled to open at the end of October, the courts will service both University of Toronto students and the public.

The financing arrangement for the expansion will also come as welcome news to students. They will not be charged. The approximate cost of $240,000 is being raised through the limited sale of memberships to the community. In addition, a Wintario grant has been applied for and Director of Recreation, T. Pallandi, is confident that it will be forthcoming.

Pallandi pointed out that students will have no trouble getting playing time during the morning and early afternoon, because the public uses the courts in the evening and weekends; times that are normally vacant.

The expansion of the squash program at Scarborough follows the same pattern as tennis, which grew from four outdoor courts to the present eleven. Still, more tennis courts are needed, because every addition generates interest and members.

If this growth pattern should continue in Squash, even those who as yet do not know the joys of bashing into walls and dodging flying objects, should find lots of opportunity to do so in the future.

Rowers In Action

By BRENDON MULROY

On Saturday, September 24, the University of Toronto will host the Third Annual Head of the Lake Regatta. Participating universities include: Brock, Trent, Western, McMaster, Queens and Guelph.

The regatta, which starts off another season of 'screaming thighs and searing lungs', will be held along the lakefront, from Ontario Place to the Argonaut Rowing Club with the presentation of awards and a party to follow.

Crews entered in both women's and men's novice, junior Varsity and Varsity categories will race the 1,500 metre distance in a head style manner. This involves each crew starting approximately 15 seconds behind the preceding crew. Narrow points along the course necessitate this type of race, rather than the more conventional six abreast start.

Head coach Chris French feels that "a strong nucleus returning from last year's crews, combined with some promising new faces, gives us an excellent chance to topple Western."

Adds crew captain Rob Haag: "Last year Western rowed extremely well in taking medals away from us in two divisions. I don't know if they can row that well again. I do know that we are still hungry."

Perhaps the most interesting race of the day comes in the novice category. Here, desire and raw power are often more important than superior rowing skills. Comments John Czegléti, Coach of U of T's victorious novice crew in 1976: "We try to teach them the fundamentals, but the short season doesn't give us much time. Basically when those guys come down the stretch during a race, they're going on guts alone."

The U of T women's crew has been training with plenty of determination down in Port Credit. So, if you want to see them win and help celebrate come on down. The first race is due to start at 10:00 a.m. sharp but the action will continue for much of the afternoon.

Soccer Blues Get Ready

It's that time of year again. When mild-mannered students drop everything in a mad rush to make the 5:30 pilgrimage to the north field. The reason for this unusual behaviour is quite simple. The students are very anxious to make it to soccer practise.

You all know what a soccer practise is? That is when you have a collection of poor misguided souls who think they are athletes, run up and down a field for two hours trying to kick a ball between two posts. The idea of it all.

What motivates men to such madness? In this case they are driven on by a sincere desire to perform for the Varsity Blues Soccer team. To perform well in these evening practises could very well earn an aspiring star the right to perform on one of the best university teams in the country.

Word from the soccer field is that everyone is not cut out to be a soccer player. Anyone can be an athlete but not all athletes can be soccer players.

There are three ingredients which combine to make a Varsity Blues soccer player. They are dedication, hard work and a love for the game.

If you possess these three ingredients the soccer team wants to have a look at you. Drop by the north field tonight at 5:30 and join a winner.

The Varsity soccer team is also looking for cheerleaders. Anyone interested please drop by the north field after 5:30.

Tumbling Anyone...

Last year the U of T Mens Gymnastics Team finished a solid second to York in the OUA Championships. This years version of the team is looking for new members.

Any interested persons are invited to an open meeting Thurs., Sept. 22nd in the Benson Building Lower Gym at 4:30 p.m. If you are unable to attend the meeting just leave a note with Simon Smith, Box 242, New College (name, phone no.).

Practices will start, officially, Tues., Sept. 27th at 4:30 p.m., with four trainings a week until Christmas. Willingness to compete at the intercollegiate level is not necessary. If all you want to do is learn some gymnastics then you are welcome to any of the workouts.

CONCERNED ABOUT THE ENVIRONMENT?

INI 220Y, An Innis College Course on Canadian environmental issues, has space for students interested in examining such important issues as energy development, Native peoples' land claims, and water pollution from a socio-political perspective. Course meets on Tuesday from 4-6 p.m.

Bruce Pollock: A Man With A Mission

By HUGH STUART

There are basically two ways for a defensive halfback to get any ink in the sports section; as the hero or as the goat. Few people know that better than the Varsity Blues' Bruce Pollock.

Until last Saturday, few Varsity fans had forgotten that fateful day last fall when Wayne Parizeau's pass to Dan Gieruszak with 51 seconds left in the game ended the Blues' College Bowl hopes. Neither had many fans forgotten that it was Pollock who was beaten on the play. But thanks to Pollock's last minute heroics on Saturday, last year's miscue will soon be a distant memory.

A short recap of Saturday's events will rekindle the memories of those who may have forgotten Pollock's heroics.

Trailing 17-13 with only seconds left on the clock, Laurier had the ball on the Varsity one yard line. To win the game the Hawks had to score a touchdown on the last play of the game. Quarterback Nelson handed the ball to Phil Colwell who headed for a hole in the right side of the line. As he headed for the goal line, Colwell was met by Robin Rushton and Pollock. It was Pollock's hit which knocked Colwell back, preventing him from scoring the game-winning touchdown.

What was going through Pollock's mind before the big play? It wasn't thoughts of last year, and it was not being a hero.

"In the heat of the game my mind was really a blank except for the realization that I had to hit the ball carrier as hard as I could. We were expecting them to run, and it helped that they ran a play that they had been running all day. I remember hitting him (Phil Colwell) and a bunch of bodies flying around, and that was it. It was a real team effort all the way," explained Pollock.

This is Pollock's seventh, and final, year of university and things have worked out well because this is also the law student's last year of OCAA eligibility. After two seasons of playing for Queen's University, and two for U of T, Pollock might have hung up the cleats at the end of last season if the Blues had won the College Bowl. Losing to Laurier made the decision to play again this year much easier since the College Bowl is the pinnacle of Pollock's football dreams. He has no intention of trying for a pro career.

"I'd be crazy to even try to play pro ball when I can make good money as a lawyer without getting my head bashed in. Anyway, I only weigh 150!" rationalizes Pollock.

As a third year veteran, Pollock is well qualified to talk about the Blues' chances this year. It is therefore nice to know that he has a good feeling about this year's team when compared to those of the last two years. According to Pollock, the downfall of last year's team was complacency caused by the fact that they had so much experience and were perpetually ranked at or near the top of the Canadian college rankings. He feels that that situation has been remedied through this season's large influx of rookies.

"This year's rookies have added the ingredient that was missing last year; I'd call it youthful exuberance. We've certainly got the talent, and I think we're hungry enough to go all the way to the College Bowl," states Pollock.

The national rankings will probably not inspire overconfidence this year either. It clearly will be a long, upward battle all the way.

Pollock will play a big part in the Blues' quest and if he's as successful at law as he is at football he won't have to worry about turning down those huge contracts that pro teams are bound to offer him!

Pollock hopes to retire as league champ.

Intramural Sports Booming

By JIM O'LEARY

Anyone who has been through the Athletic Wing of Hart House lately has probably noticed the flourish of activity emanating from room 106. The cause of all this activity is the preparation being done for the upcoming intramural sports season.

The intramural office offers 17 activities open to the students of every college or faculty in the university. This year it is expected that the men's program alone will attract over 7500 participants.

The beginning of the intramural program can be traced back to 1936. At this time Mac McCutcheon was chosen to initiate a sports program which would allow students to participate in a friendly but competitive atmosphere. The program he devised included hockey, baseball, badminton, lacrosse, waterpolo, volleyball, soccer, football and golf.

Today the intramural co-ordinator is Dave Copp. Despite the change in co-ordinators, the program remains very similar to the one initiated in 1936. As Copp puts it "there is very little you can change because the facilities today are much the same as they were when the program started."

The men's intramural program is run by a staff of three. These people are responsible for scheduling, assigning referees, gathering scores and in general, seeing that the various leagues run smoothly. As the various participants of these leagues will attest the administrative staff do a remarkable job.

The intramural leagues are run by an annual budget of over $55,000. The bulk of this money is used to pay for lifeguards and referees. Unfortunately, in the past couple of weeks an increasing amount of this money has had to be spent to replace the goalposts on the football fields. It seems that for some unknown reason some idiot or group of idiots has been tearing down the posts on both the front and back fields.

The competition in the intramural leagues is often intense as the various teams vie to capture their division title. The reward for victory in any specific category is a team trophy. Many of the trophies are steeped with tradition which helps to intensify the struggle for victory.

The Mulock Cup was introduced to the University in 1894. It is the oldest trophy in Canada which is still competed for annually and is awarded to the winners of the interfaculty football league.

The members of the interfaculty soccer league compete for the Arts and Science Cup. This trophy dates back to 1895.

As well as team trophies, each member of a winning team will be receiving an individual award compliments of Molson Breweries.

The intramural office looks to the future years when there will be many changes in the intramural program. The reason for this outlook is the construction of the athletic complex.

The completion of the new complex will allow for the expansion of the intramural program. As well as providing more space for existing leagues the new building will allow the intramural program to become involved in new sports ventures.

Among the new ventures Copp can foresee is the establishment of a club program. This type of program will allow students to participate in activities such as judo, karate, and underwater clubs.

The basic philosophy underlying the intramural program is to make maximum use of the facilities by the maximum number of people. A walk through Hart House or past the playing fields will show that based on this criteria, the intramural program is a great success.

Conservatory still plagued with financial woes

By JACKIE LONDON

The Royal Conservatory of Music of Toronto as we know it is gradually ceasing to exist because of seemingly insurmountable financial problems.

Dr. Samuel Dolin of the Conservatory related that equivalent institutions in other countries, such as the Conservatory of Paris, have thrived and survived because they are totally subsidized by the government. In Germany, the Stuttgart Conservatory is under the Hochschule system under which students pay tuition of $20 per year.

But in Canada, he said, the Conservatory which has produced some of the most outstanding teachers in the world and some of the world's greatest and most famous living musicians received no government help whatsoever.

To study with the best teachers a student must firstly pay $44 per hour, according to George Hoskins, the Conservatory's business administrator. In addition, each student must pay approximately $8 per hour per class.

Twenty three per cent of this money is retained by the Conservatory to finance its operations, he said. Unpaid time is donated by the teachers to fulfill management and curriculum-setting functions.

Conservatory students may receive OSAP on the condition that they take a minimum of two hours weekly in lessons, said Hoskins. Students find, therefore, the entire OSAP money — both maintenance and fees — must be spent to pay fees.

The Conservatory Building is old and massive. Each floor is the equivalent of two storeys high and two buildings wide. Students are forced to carry their books and belongings from one end of the building to the other because there is only one locker per 450 students, according to registration staff.

There is no cafeteria or vending machines in the building, it was revealed. Last year the shortage of space caused bathrooms and telephone booths to be converted into music studios. The matter caused some merriment until actual incidents began to occur where students were unable to get from the washroom to their classes on time.

Most of the major teaching of the Conservatory is devoted to training professional musicians of world stature. In the last decade the Conservatory has begun to slip, some teaching staff feel, because no money has been available to institute the programs necessary to meet the recent revolution in musical composition.

While there are exceptions, virtually all of the teaching prepares pupils to cope only with music written up to 1900. No techniques are taught to help the students deal with the problems of twentieth century music that they meet professionally.

According to Joseph Macerollo, one of the teaching staff, the Conservatory is the only major conservatory in the world without a program that brings the most important living composers before the students. It cannot ever afford a single series that presents music being written in this country, he said.

Furthermore, many staff members object to the Conservatory's inability to separate its teaching function from its system of examination for young children that it administers throughout Canada.

Helen Bickell, Examinations Supervisor, stated that more than 52,000 Canadian children took Royal Conservatory of Music examinations last year. Conservatory teachers, however, estimate that as many as five times that amount of students actively engaged in studying music have refused to take examinations, because they include nineteenth century technical requirements and require young children to perform small pieces at concert pianist level to obtain any mark over 80 per cent.

When asked to comment on the situation, U of T president John Evans said that "technically speaking, the university is eligible to receive a government grant of approximately $200,000 a year on behalf of Conservatory students at the post-secondary school level." Evans said the Conservatory is presently operating on a "shoestring." The sum would not solve all the problems, he said, but would eliminate the major abuses and enable the Conservatory to make a significant advance.

Dolin, who created the Conservatory's high prestige composition diploma, hopes the problem will be given priority by U of T's governing council. Commenting on the situation, Dolin said: "You must not emphasize the bad points of the situation. The facts are that this Conservatory has outstanding people. With some government support for the students and teachers we could make tremendous advances almost at once."

Newspaper revives

Balcony Square, Scarborough College's student newspaper reopened last week after a brief suspension. The paper was forced to shut down because an overworked staff could no longer carry their courses and the newspaper at the same time. The first issue will hit the streets on October 18th.

The paper reopened due to the enthusiasm and efforts of its new editor Gail Misiunas. She was a reporter from last year and is interested in journalism. Most of the skeleton staff that left the paper will not be returning. Only the photography editor is expected to continue on. This means that the editor will have to rely largely on new staff, although Misiunas said former staff would come to help out in the beginning.

A recruitment campaign is now in progress on Scarborough campus, a workshops are also being set up. The editor will continue to receive $25 a week, and other staffers involved in production will receive an honorarium at the end of the year.

The newspaper publishes twice a week but closed down when its editor Dennis Schilling and managing editor Ann Holland put academia first. Schilling has a part-time job; this along with course work became too time-consuming to publish a paper at the same time.

Mystery gift not revealed

By ANNIE WOODS

Unnamed sources revealed last week that Erindale College will be giving a surprise gift to the University of Toronto as part of their sesquicentennial celebrations. The mystery gift will be presented at a formal ceremony at the University in October.

Erindale was at a loss to find something appropriate for the distinguished university going into its 150th year. A rustic park bench was suggested, but U of T landscapers didn't think that "rusticity" would suit the modern St. George campus.

Further problems arose when the first contractors who were supposed to provide the mystery gift failed to show up. However, now the gift has arrived on campus and awaits official presentation.

So, in keeping with the spirit of Christmas: The gift is reportedly bigger than a bread basket and can be found in a central location. It is a gift which most students will utilize often. In fact most UC students will run right into it — or rather onto it.

Sexual values and childhood

By ANN CLARKSON

The attitudes formed in childhood towards sexuality and the resultant values held in adult life were the topics discussed in an encounter group ambience at the second Survival Workshop held Wednesday at Sidney Smith Hall. The seminar in sexuality was led by Rhonda Katz, a sexual therapist from the U of T Advisory Bureau.

Before a small group composed exclusively of women, Katz discussed the positive and negative influence of parental role models upon a child, as well as the various behavioral limitations which have restricted sexual expression. Exploring such questions as: "How did your parents show affection?" "How was nudity and masturbation treated?" and "What did your parents think about homosexuality, pre-marital sex and extra-marital sex?" each woman examined the strong impact her upbringing had on her present attitudes. Katz emphasized each individual's "power to ultimately shape his or her own affectional responses."

Since sex education is often incorrectly understood, Katz encouraged "self-exploration if one feels comfortable" so that "we learn the different parts of us (sic) and what gives us pleasure." Katz stated that "more parents feel comfortable with masturbation now and realize it is necessary for socialization." Citing Robert Chartham, a highly regarded sexual therapist who advocates the teaching of masturbation techniques to all women, Katz also recalled the Kinsey report published in the early fifties which stated that 99 per cent of men masturbate by late adolescence as compared to only 50-60 per cent of the women.

A discussion of values held by both the individual and society led to the general consensus, despite the variety of backgrounds of the participants, that "limitations" like the privacy of sexual activity should be retained. Other traditional limitations such as monogamy should be dissolved. However, discrepancies arose during the discussion between personal values and values considered good for society as a whole. For example, in social terms no conclusion was reached as to the favorability of the following "limitation" — "if persons are blood-related, sexual intercourse and stimulation should be prohibited" (incest).

Katz stated that there is "a real desire to discuss sexual attitudes within such small groups" and "they (sexual attitudes) really have to and should be discussed," Katz herself feels strongly that "there is a definite need to talk openly about one's sexuality."

Are you willing to recognize the influence your upbringing had on your reaction to this picture?

Sex Ed Centre available

By CAROL EDWARDS

The Sex Education Centre, located at 44 St. George St., is designed, according to director Molly Yeoman, to counsel students in "all aspects of sexuality." It directs them to community services, doctors, clinics and therapists. Pamphlets offering advice on birth control, pregnancy and venereal disease are available to visitors, and when the clinic first opened last spring, it offered abortion referrals.

The abortion referral service caused considerable upheaval at St. Michael's College. As the Sex Ed Centre is funded by the Students' Administrative Council (SAC), St. Michael's objected to contributing to a group engaged in any form of abortion activities. It was decided, eventually by SAC that the Sex Ed Centre would no longer give abortion referrals. Instead, it now offers educational counselling on abortion. The centre counsellors will see that the woman gets all the information she needs on her pregnancy and understands all the services available to her. If she decides on an abortion, she will be referred to the Health Service where the staff will help her over any difficulties.

The Sex Ed Centre motto is "Drop in before you need to" said Yeoman. The staff believe that one of their major jobs is "counselling to avoid situations." But if a "fait accompli" does arise, the centre does offer information on gynaecologists, sexual therapists, single parenthood, family planning and genetic counselling. They will try "to protect your freedom of choice by offering the choice of as many organizations as possible," said Yeoman.

The centre will insure that information disclosed remains confidential, said Yeoman. If a pregnancy or venereal disease test is needed, the centre will help find a clinic tailored to an individual's personal needs and tastes. If you don't have OHIP they can help you find free assistance. If you're embarrassed to talk to your family doctor, they'll find someone you feel more comfortable with. The centre has ties with the Immigrant Women's Centre, and a number of staff members are multi-lingual so the centre can avoid "shuffling people around."

The Sex Ed Centre is also training students to work as counsellors. Because they offer peer group counselling, they are depending on volunteers to help them expand their services. The basic qualifications required are empathy, objectivity and a willingness to learn. Educational background is "not that important" according to Yeoman. Right now, the Sex Ed Centre employs a sociology student, a nursing student, an education student, a languages student and a Chinese-speaking student. Yeoman herself holds a degree in Psychology and has done extensive volunteer work.

The Sex Ed Centre will be very active this year according to Yeoman. Advertising is planned and workshops and discussion groups will be organized. Their present hours are Monday to Friday, from 12 to 2 p.m. After November they hope to increase those hours. By Christmas they hope to counsel in the residences. They are looking forward in the future to setting up "communication links" with other universities "to resolve the common problems of university service."

Liberals and NDP attack grant plan

By KEN WHITEHURST

The new Ontario Study Grant Plan (OSGP) will restrict access to graduate and professional schools to the children of the rich and augurs ill for undergraduates, according to the Liberal and NDP critics for Colleges and Universities.

Liberal critic for Colleges and Universities John Sweeney (MPP, Kitchener, Wilmet) said that the new plan "is another grand case of the right hand giveth, but the left hand taketh away."

Post-secondary students, argued Sweeney, "will not be much better off under this new program, and for graduate education, it is a disaster."

NDP critic Ted Bounsall (MPP, Windsor-Sandwich) said the plan "is a great scheme that clearly indicates that only students from wealthy families need consider professional or post-graduate courses."

He is also concerned that many undergraduates who need financial assistance will not be able to get it from the new plan. "The continued stressing of stricter criteria forbodes dark omens for students already struggling on the edge of poverty," warned Bounsall.

Sweeney is pleased to see that students' actual summer earnings will be considered when determining grant eligibility, rather than continuing with the government's past expectation that students make the sometimes unearnable fixed contribution toward the cost of their education.

Sweeney is not pleased that it will be more difficult to be classified as an independent student. It used to be that students who had worked full-time for two years were classified as independent of their families, but under the new plan they must work for three years to achieve the same status.

Both the Liberal and NDP critics think that Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott is withholding grant eligibility figures, because the new eligibility criteria will cut many people off from grant assistance who are presently receiving it.

Beefing up the Ontario Graduate Scholarship Program (OGSP) is a totally inadequate substitute for the provincial grants that graduate and professional are presently receiving, argued both critics.

Also, Bounsall is concerned that the new plan will discourage many adult students who are commencing their studies on a part-time basis with the hope of progressing to full-time studies.

He holds this opinion because, like their younger, full-time counterparts, part-time students will be eligible for grants for eight 10 to 19 week periods. Whether a student takes one course for 10 to 19 weeks or six courses in the same amount of time, he will use up a complete eligibility period.

Bounsall demanded the government guarantee that the promised public participation appeal board will be ready for the first year of the new plan, and he called upon Parrott to make it clear immediately that no student already in the post-secondary system will suffer from the introduction of the reduced eligibility period.

The Children's Hour - at U of T

Relations between the student press and the student engineers are better than ever.

The petty vandalism that occurred in The Varsity offices over the weekend is depressing proof of the grade school attitude held by some U of T students, and apparently condoned by their elected representatives, towards institutions that are trying to carry out their function in spite of them. The office equipment that was stolen was booty in a treasure hunt carried out across campus.

Unfortunately the timing of the big heist was particularly bad. Putting out an issue of this paper is a twelve to fourteen hour operation that begins at noon the day before the issue appears. Production is a serious business entailing many hours at typewriters and many hours on the telephone, all done under the pressure of meeting a series of irresistible deadlines.

It's difficult to telephone for information when the phone's not there. It's more difficult to answer the telephone when you can't hear it ring, another consequence of Saturday's prank.

The lack of concern expressed by members of this university's student council is surprising in view of the fact that they knew about the missing objects long before any of the paper's staff arrived to start production the next day.

Perhaps they don't consider production a serious business either. It's inexcusable that with the amount of money tied up in this one commission of their other many commissions — over $150,000 — a greater attempt wasn't made to set things aright.

The concern that has been frequently voiced by the council towards the paper was sadly lacking in this instance. What is humour for some is a minor annoyance for others; in this case, the annoyance managed to stretch into a lengthy visit from U of T's finest. While we are always pleased to see the university's employees hard at work, and the council is always pleased to see their employees slugging away too, the annoyance took up too much time and effort on the part of both.

If the engineers' purpose was to create a few yuks for today's paper, we hope they are satisfied. Moreover, we are always pleased to see increased communications between two traditionally antagonistic campus bodies. We hope that the engineers are pleased with their cleverness but they should realize that things asked for politely can be had for the taking too.

One question puzzles us: If it is necessary to seal miscellaneous items from The Varsity, why not take Ken Kingston, the little wooden penguin whose legs move up and down when you pull the string? It was left here by one staffer's children, they would, no doubt, be quite willing to lend it out to the engineers for a period of time.

Harry Parrot, what are you afraid of?

Ed's note: This is a copy of an unanswered letter sent to Parrott last Monday.

Dear Dr. Parrott:

I am writing you with respect to your proposed series of public meetings to discuss the new student assistance program to be introduced in Ontario in 1978-79.

While applauding your decision to hold such meetings to invite input, we have very serious reservations that the meetings as scheduled will truly allow for meaningful participation in the student aid decision-making process. In particular, we must strenuously object to the exclusion of the University of Toronto as a site for a public meeting.

As I hope the following will make abundantly clear, we do not so for parochial reasons, but rather, reasons having to do with the degree to which the public meetings will actually contribute effective student and public input into the plan.

As you are no doubt aware, the University of Toronto is Ontario's largest university. Additionally, as such, it has the highest number of OSAP recipients of any Ontario post-secondary institution. For these reasons alone we believe the omission of the University of Toronto as a meeting site is deplorable.

Moreover, the University of Toronto has the highest number of professional faculty students, who would be those most affected by your proposal to limit student assistance to first-degree students only. This factor, we believe, should be given more extensive consideration.

The proposed Toronto public meeting site, Seneca College, is all but inaccessible to University of Toronto students. It would be particularly inaccessible to professional faculty students, by reason of their large number of class hours. I am certain that you yourself, as a former professional faculty student, can well appreciate this latter point.

Therefore, the University of Toronto Students' Administrative Council cordially invites you to hold a public meeting at the University of Toronto, for the purpose of discussing your student aid proposals, at a time of your convenience. We would see this meeting as supplementing, not substituting for, the Seneca College meeting. We would be more than pleased to handle all arrangements for the meeting. As you may be aware, there are a number of locations, such as Convocation Hall which seats 1,800 people, which would be more than suitable for such a purpose.

We would also point out that a meeting at the University of Toronto would greatly facilitate the participation of students of Ryerson Polytechnical and George Brown in a discussion of your student aid proposals.

Student aid has been easily the most important issue at Ontario post-secondary institutions over the last few years. Since the changes that are made in 1978-79 will likely determine the form of student aid in Ontario for many years to come, these particular upcoming meetings are of great importance. The need for maximum input is crucial.

Therefore, I would urge you to reply in the affirmative as soon as possible, so that the proper arrangements can be made.

Letters to the editor

All nationalities needed in Canada

We understand that Canada has no true native tongue. The English language can be said to have the most effect in public relations all across Canada, but that can also be disputed. At present, the Quebecers are fighting—for bilingualism, which means that Canada will be, in the near future, an Enlarged Quebec. In other words, Canada will lose its multi-nationalistic and distinctive feature.

What will happen? Simply this. Other nationalities will search for the same freedom. Obviously, there are many French-speaking people, but there are as many Chinese, German and Italian speaking people, who feel they are great in number as well.

Let's face it. If we were to take a few Canadian history lessons we would soon realize that the Indians were here first. Then came the French and English. Canada was and still is a land of opportunity. Let us not spoil it by catering to one side: the French-Canadians (as one would call them). What about the English-Canadians, not to mention the rest?

Without the other cultures and nationalities who work as hard to make this Canada a place to live this vast country would be dull and lifeless.

Let's keep Canada a growing place and an experience for one and all.

What will happen if French becomes an enrolment requirement at this great university of ours?

All of Quebec will move in. Pierre Trudeau wants control, so let's save our country from perishing. Canada means Culture, Ambition, Nationalities and Diversity.

Eastman on smaller universities

The Varsity attributed to me views about the future of Ontario universities that may have been expressed by others, but certainly not by myself. In the course of a telephone interview last Wednesday, I discussed the uncertainties that Ontario universities face respecting the system that might be employed to fund graduate programmes when the present temporary arrangements lapse after one more year. I indicated that the funding system of the future should maintain a basic level of support for each approved graduate programme, irrespective of its enrolment and that the level of enrolment should be funded by a variable sum. The question that would continue would be which programmes to support in the province and my contention was that they should be limited in number and selected according to their quality.

I did not express any views about the fate of smaller universities in the Ontario university system.

U of T's Single Parents

By VICTORIA FREEMAN

It used to be that single mothers were delinquent teenagers living in disgrace on welfare and single fathers were widowers like Fred McMurray in My Three Sons who managed very well with housekeepers. But most of the single parents at the University of Toronto today are part of a new phenomenon — a single parent lifestyle which is growing in popularity as an alternative to traditional marriage and family life.

These new single parents are mainly in their mid-twenties and thirties; they are intelligent and sophisticated and have chosen to integrate parenthood into their lives rather than letting parenthood be their lives. "It's a movement", explains Theo Dawson, a mother of a small baby and a student of drama. "My doctor's a single parent. My therapist's a single parent. I even had a dentist who was a single mother."

The new single parenthood is partially a result of the rapid increase in the number of divorces and the sexual revolution of the sixties which dispensed with marriage altogether. "In a society where the nuclear family is not proving to be a stable relationship, we not only have to face the fact that there are going to be single parents, but we have to accept that more of us are going to choose to be. I think that single parenthood is an extremely viable alternative to the nuclear family — especially combining single parenthood with new kinds of relationships."

Theo became pregnant last year and decided to keep her child even though the father wanted her to have an abortion. "I had no moral aversion to abortion; I wanted to have a child. If the father wasn't emotionally capable of being involved, I wasn't going to force him."

No-one knows how many single parents are currently studying at the University of Toronto, but apparently their numbers have increased substantially over the past few years. For single mothers in particular, higher education offers respectability and financial independence; the most likely alternatives are living on welfare or mother's allowance, or working at a low-paying dead-end "women's" job. University also gives single parents a chance to get out of the house, meet other adults and develop intellectually.

Penny Shaw, a graduate student in zoology, explained her reasons for returning to school: "I have to do this career thing. I need the involvement. I'd be a miserable, bad mother and a horrible person to live with without it."

Theo, who studies part-time, is not necessarily seeking a degree: "I'll keep taking courses at U of T for as long as I'm interested. I consider formal education to be just another branch of living."

Combining single parenthood and school is not easy task. Aside from making incredible demands on one's time and energy, university is expensive. The single parent must arrange for daycare or babysitting and has higher living expenses than other students.

There are government programs to help single parents in financial need but not all single parents are eligible. For example, a single father cannot receive family benefits (formerly mother's allowance), although this law has recently been challenged and may be changed. A single mother cannot receive benefits if she is living with a man "as if they were married", no matter how poor her student boyfriend may be. This rule forces her to trade the emotional support she may need for financial security.

Family benefits are paid to unwed, widowed, divorced or deserted mothers, but not to mothers who deserted their husbands or agreed to a separation. Debbie Thorson, who was separated from her husband, was refused mother's allowance because she wouldn't sue the father for support. She, like other single parents who do not qualify for family benefits, had to go on welfare. "I found being on welfare demeaning because I was lumped together with people who had given up and were no longer trying."

Theo Dawson found that while the welfare office treated her well, she had to deal with guilt about receiving public "hand-outs". "I feel guilty because traditional 'womens' work has not been considered worthy of pay, and yet I am doing valuable work. The government fulfills basically the same function as the traditional husband: it gives you money."

Family benefits and welfare do not pay the educational expenses of the single parent, but single parents who study part-time can apply for aid from the Ontario Special Bursary Program, which will cover tuition fees, books, transportation and childcare for the hours the parent is at school. However, this aid is mainly intended for undergraduates, since it is difficult to go to graduate or professional school on a part-time basis.

Full-time students can apply for OSAP loans and grants, and if they are receiving family benefits they can still receive the maximum award of $2,500, $1,000 of which is a loan. At present, graduate students are eligible, but a new system has been proposed for next year which would make OSAP available only to undergraduates — and only for four years.

This could seriously affect educational opportunities for single parents. Consider Penny's case: "I'm in the middle of a graduate program in zoology and now I'm faced with $4,000 a year for four years and I'm already $6,000 in debt. I started with a grade 11 education and two kids after having been out of school for ten years, and I've gone through high school, pre-university courses, and university, working towards my Ph.D. so I can do research. Now I don't know what to do."

Some single parents are forced to combine parenthood, full-time studies and part-time work. But according to Penny, you can't be a full-time graduate student and work part-time. Some single parents in graduate school survive on research grants or assistantships.

Adequate daycare is a necessity for single parents in university. There are several daycare centres on or near the university campus; most charge between $200 and $250 a month for one child, but parents in financial need can apply for subsidization. However, the number of subsidized places in each daycare centre is limited and there are often waiting lists.

The main problem with daycare is that generally it is not available after six in the evening, so parents cannot attend classes scheduled from 4 to 6 or 7 and usually cannot afford babysitters for night classes. Also, some of the daycare centres are cooperatively run by the parents, but single parents may not have the time to contribute.

Another problem single parents often run into is finding suitable housing near the university. Many landlords don't want to rent to a single woman and a child, and it's hard to find a supportive atmosphere.

Theo Dawson spent five months looking for a place to live; now she lives in a house with three other adults — who are mutually supportive in everything from dishwashing to childcare — and one other child besides her own daughter. Some parents find it hard to live in a communal atmosphere, either because most co-ops won't allow children or because different are given top priority and are generally accepted by the married students. Some of them participate in the babysitting exchange which has been organized at the residence.

It is possible for a single parent to get through school and survive in spite of all the odds against him or her, but it's physically and emotionally exhausting. According to Jean Hall, the single parents she has met have impressed her with their determination. "In 99 per cent ideas of how to raise children arise among members of the co-op.

About thirty single parents, including two single fathers, live at the Married Students Residence on Charles Street, where they can rent a two-bedroom apartment for $268 a month. According to Jean Hall, Admissions Officer for the Married Students Residence, single parents of cases they can do it with encouragement." "You can do anything you have to," says Penny.

It's perhaps hardest for single parents to deal with other people's attitudes to single parenthood. "I've had zero support," says Penny Shaw. "The average person you deal with is a middle-aged man who has no idea of what it's like to be a

Letters to the CORRECTIONS CORR

As one of the student members of the Internal Affairs Committee which debated the question of non-academic incidental fees, I would like to comment on The Varsity article "Bliss attacks incidental fees."

The Internal Affairs Committee did not 'discuss the issue in camera' as your reporter alleged: On the contrary, a motion was passed which recommended that the present policy be continued (i.e. that non-academic incidental fees continue to be collected on a compulsory basis). Only then did the Committee go into closed session, but it was to discuss other matters unrelated to the policy on incidental fees.

It seems to me incredible that for an issue that has such drastic implications in all aspects of university life, The Varsity should send such an inexperienced reporter to cover that event. There seems little point in The Varsity attempting to report on events in woman or a single parent in school. "Some people think that because I'm a woman and mother I'm not really interested in a career and so they treat me as a dilettante. People say to me: 'Why aren't you with your children?' and see me as some horrible, radical person who wants daycare, but they wouldn't say anything if a single father hired a housekeeper."

According to Theo, "an awful lot of people, when they see you are a have to be slightly better than average or else people blame you because there's no father around."

"Everybody is always surprised that I have nice children," says Penny. "My kids have had poverty and logistical stress, but never the kind of stress I see in two-parent families when the parents are fighting."

Carolyn Humphreys is a single mother who is working on her Ph.D. in Counselling Psychology and is particularly interested in the results of single parenthood. "So far, there has not been a lot of research on the effects of single parenthood, except in terms of father absence. There are a lot more variables than that."

In her opinion, "economics are a basic, but social supports are critical" in determining whether or not a single parent can cope, raise children successfully or go to school.

Some single parents seek professional therapy to help adjust to their new lifestyle; others see counsellors at the university, and many seek out other single parents either informally or through single parent groups. "One of the most important things for me since Jessica's birth has been meeting other women who are in a similar situation. That's the best way to get information and find support."

Perhaps the greatest benefit of single parenthood is that it forces a woman to discover her own strengths and abilities. As Carolyn put it: "The number of women who are managing well says that women are capable of being both mothers and breadwinners." Or as Theo observed: "In a way, being single and pregnant freed me to face personal issues that I needed to face. I feel stronger and more powerful than I ever have before."

According to Jean Hall, many of the single parents she sees would like it if they formed a permanent attachment but it's not their main concern and it's difficult to find men who would accept their children.

Says Debbie Thorson: "I don't think anybody really wants to be alone but sometimes it's the lesser evil. There's no time for husband-hunting anyway." Penny observed: "I really love being single and I really love people. It would have to be a liberated man."

Theo says: "Now that I know I can live on my own without the formal commitments I wouldn't give up the freedom and joy of my present relationships for any kind of marriage."

"We use only the best ingredients in our meals"

By CONNIE FILLETTI

If you're an on-campus resident, you've probably made and heard enough comments about the food served to you to write a book. With each residence meal comes "food for thought". Sorry about that folks, but seriously, haven't you often found yourself wondering exactly what you're getting for your money?

Victoria College offers one meal plan (19 meals per week) to 268 women residents and 256 men residents. The Annesley and Burwash kitchens are separately run, each responsible for its own staff, menus and wholesalers. The three cafeterias (including Wymilwood) at Victoria College are open to all U of T students.

The kitchen at Annesley Hall women's residence was originally built to service only Annesley inhabitants. It now must accommodate students living in Margaret Addison Hall (200 daily) in addition to the men residents from Burwash who dine at Annesley on Saturdays. As a result, kitchen facilities at Annesley are somewhat limited.

Elizabeth Hewson, chief dietician at Burwash Hall since 1945 heads a kitchen staff of 28. Hewson estimates 90 percent of their food is homemade, including rolls, muffins, cookies and cakes.

"Except for produce, we rarely have complaints about the quality of the merchandise," Hewson said. "We have more complaints to make (to the wholesaler) on produce such as potatoes, apples and bananas."

Annesley assistant dietician Elizabeth Hinchcliff claims, "all our fresh produce is used. We have a great amount of turnover and we place orders every day."

Any complaints concerning Burwash food services are lodged with Marilyn Strand, assistant dietician at the men's residence for three years.

Strand is "very impressed" with how well organized food services at Burwash are. She also is "proud that the kitchens are kept very, very clean."

According to Hewson, pest control personnel call monthly although Burwash "doesn't have any specific problem anymore."

When asked how a wasp found its way into this reporter's bowl of soup one dinner hour and, by Burwash kitchen staff admission, into at least one other person's soup, Hewson said such incidences can't be controlled.

Hewson claims the Toronto Department of Health does not advise Burwash or Annesley in advance of an impending inspection. She also said the Department of Health does not necessarily come every academic year. "They have said they don't see the need to come," Hewson stated.

Hinchcliff on the other hand said the Department of Health visits Annesley "quite frequently." "We always get an extra good report but there is nothing written down on the frequency of visits."

Vic residents' opinion to the college's food services is mixed.

Ian McIntosh, third year commerce major says "breakfast is often pretty bad. The major complaint is there isn't enough variety. Lunch is usually passable and supper is the best meal of the day. I guess it's as good as any other food I've tasted on campus and the staff is cooperative and friendly."

John Pappel, fourth year zoology major says the food is "all right." His main complaint is with lack of quantity.

"You can eat nearly half a loaf of bread with dinner and you still have to go to MacDonald's," claims Pappel. He says there is "pretty good variety but the swiss steak is a classic."

Debbie Fletcher, second year zoology major and Annesley Hall resident said, "as far as institutional food goes, the meals here are quite acceptable."

Karen Lorimer, first year social sciences student added, "I don't like institutional food to begin with. find by the time I get it it's cold and the limiting of quantities is deplorable. Considering the fees we pay we're getting unfair treatment."

CAREERS IN BUSINESS MANAGEMENT

Back to school. Exams. Christmas. More classes, more exams and graduation. And next...

Right now you are probably thinking about the past several years and what you have to look forward to after graduation.

While you're at it, consider the personal growth and satisfactions you could experience at Procter & Gamble—a leader in the consumer products industry. We regard training and development as our most basic responsibility because we promote strictly from within Procter & Gamble. We know of no way to train people to become managers other than to have them learn by doing.

Economics, history, psychology — our managers include diverse backgrounds. More important than your specific field of study are such basics as intelligence, leadership ability, innovativeness, and a solid track record of achievement.

Prior to on-campus interviews, representatives from Marketing, Finance, and Sales will be visiting your campus to answer questions and talk about their experiences at Procter & Gamble. Specific date, place and time will be advertised soon in this newspaper and at your placement office. The visit will be a one-day informal session in which all interested students can learn more about career opportunities in business management at Procter & Gamble.

As a first step, we invite you to visit your placement office and obtain a copy of our literature. Additional information is also available in the library file in the placement office.

Plan to be at our pre-recruiting session — no appointment necessary, drop in any time.

I sincerely believe from my discussions with you that you truly desire to hear from students what they think of the current student aid plan and what they think of your as of yet largely unannounced proposals for change. However, a failure to come to the University of Toronto would force us to regretfully conclude that the scheduled series of public meetings are more of a public relations exercise than a true attempt to invite student and public input into student aid change.

No only do I, but as well, the students of the University of Toronto await your reply.

Part-time jocks lose support

By KATHY CANTY

Difficulties may be on the horizon for part-time students who wish to participate in interfaculty sports.

Now that part-time students pay a $2.50 athletic fee, they are entitled to take part in most of the athletic activities at U of T. They had their first crack at intermural sports last Wednesday when Woodsworth College lost a soccer match 6-0 to the Faculty of Forestry.

Part-time students cannot join intercollegiate teams, however, and a suggestion was made at the last meeting of the Men's Intermural Sports Committee that they also be banned from interfaculty sports, according to the Co-ordinator of Intermurals and Recreation, Dave Copp.

He fears that the "intensely competitive colleges" may recruit fellows to take a course or two simply to play interfaculty sports. They would be keeping a number of full-time students off the teams, he said. "I want to be sure they are taking part in the program for the right reasons."

Copp would prefer an arrangement where part-time students would have to take four courses before they could join the interfaculty teams. If this resolution does not come up at the Men's Intermural Sports Committee meeting today, he will suggest it, he said.

Sue Evans, president of the Woodsworth College Student Association, said that when part-time students paid their athletic fee, they believed they could participate in everything. The same issue was raised over women's interfaculty athletics, but it was "dismissed out of hand," she said.

OSHC service no help to students

By ALAN BASS

The Ontario Student Housing Corporation — a non-profit student housing development agency associated with the Ontario Housing Corporation — has been and is totally inactive. Most students are not even aware of its existence.

When questioned about the corporation, Deputy Minister of Housing D.A. Crosbie said that he was not familiar with the organization's history. He attributed his lack of knowledge to the corporation's own lack of activity during the two years he has held his post. However, Crosbie did add that no funding was presently available for the corporation.

The Student Housing Corporation was created in 1966 by the provincial government. In the U of T region it acquired the apartment buildings at 30 and 35 Charles St. which were then rented to married students.

Although the original intent of the corporation was to lease the management of its buildings to whatever university the residents attended, management of the Charles St. residences is leased to a private company.

The activity of the corporation declined rapidly after its inception. By 1976, Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott disclaimed all responsibility for student housing, saying "that has been and still is a responsibility of the federal government. It has never been a policy that housing within colleges and universities should be considered outside the context of general housing."

Former NDP Housing critic Michael Cassidy, in commenting on the corporation's dormancy, claimed the conservative government "decided that students should double up or something like that" and that the corporation would be more appropriately named the Ontario Student Non-housing Corporation.

Vandals struck at The Varsity Saturday. A typewriter, telephone and clock were found missing from the offices at 91 St. George St.
Sunday morning. The Engineering Society (ES) has admitted stealing the equipment as part of Saturday's scavenger hunt.

Sports editor Jim O'Leary arrived yesterday morning to find his Underwood typewriter gone. News Editor Ann Auman reached to phone the student council (SAC) only to discover a missing phone, and City Editor Heather Hill noticed the aluminum-plated ship's wheel clock was missing.

U of T police arrived on the scene within half an hour to carry out an investigation. One of them recounted that years ago the engineering students removed the mousetraps from all the phones in
The Varsity offices as a "prank".

Student Council President John
Tuzyk said he saw The Varsity's typewriter at 2 p.m. Saturday in the ES's scavenger hunt pile at the staging area outside the botanical building.

SAC was also a victim of the engineers' scurrilous acts. Their ride board was taken but returned.
Tuzyk said he was unconcerned about the theft at The Varsity because the engineers said they would return the equipment when he spoke to them Saturday.

Doug Schmar, editor of the engineer's newspaper, the Toke, said he was the judge in the scavenger hunt. Although The Varsity offices were not specifically on the victim's list, Sch-mar said they came under the category of "miscellaneous".

As of press time Sunday, The Varsity's phone and typewriter had been returned. The clock is still missing.

Photoclub focuses in

By STEPHEN OVERBURY

Internationally acclaimed photographer Bert Heferichter kicked off the 56-year-old Hart House Camera Club's fall program with a slide show of the Montreal Olympics for an enthusiastic group of 100 camera buffs Thursday evening at Hart House.

Heferichter is a two-time recipient of the Canadian Photographer of the Year Award.

Heferichter provided a behind-the-scenes look of the Montreal extravaganza. He said he was one of three Canadian photographers hired by the Olympics organizing committee (COJO) outside of Quebec.

The slides he displayed were a sampling of the 18,000 pictures he took while working 18-hour days at the Olympics. He said most of his work had been sold by COJO without their saving duplicates, and he had little opportunity to scrape together copies of his best shots for an exhibition.

After the meeting he told The Varsity that Canadians are "totally influenced by U.S. magazines . . .
(Professional photography) is nothing but damn hard work. I've had many rejection slips but never gave up. If I sold one in 99 pictures I was happy. Hang in there," was the advice he gave to aspiring photographers.

Photography, however, can also be dangerous, he stated. While working on Big North, a film that ran at Ontario Place for two years, his two-seater plane almost crashed.

Heferichter himself was a pen-
Germany to live in Canada. He now runs an extremely lucrative studio with three employees working for him. His pictures have appeared in the largest magazines around the world. In January, he said, he hopes to travel to Africa to work on a book for a German publisher.

"After eight years of public school
I became a bricklayer," he said. "At 18 I emigrated to Canada. I was warned I might not find work but found it in three days. Somebody gave me a camera and a job wrapping parcels for a camera manufacturer."

Interfac Schedule off to slow start

By ANDY AUZINS

The first weeks back at school usually bring their share of surprises, disappointments and difficulties. The first week of the interfac sports schedule had a similar flavour.

Foremost were the difficulties. The recent wet weather has adversely affected the playing fields on both the front and back campuses. Expensive re-sodding on the back campus coupled with an extremely high water table has resulted in soggy conditions which have necessitated the closing of the east field by the Physical Plant Dept.

Needless to say this has created scheduling problems for Football and Soccer. Soccer had its schedule advanced by a day in an attempt to cope with the shortage of fields which resulted in several defaults. Practices and games were affected by the closing of the east field, with football having to relocate to the west field.

Even the indoor sports had their share of difficulties as a number of Lacrosse games had to be cancelled. This happened when themotor mechanism used to raise the basket ball nets in Hart House failed to work.

Perhaps the biggest surprise of the week's action occurred in football when St. Mike's made short work of the Vic team that defeated them in last year's final. The final score was St. Mike's 13, Vic 1.

In other A division action, Scarborough scored an impressive 28-6 victory over the Engineers, demonstrating an air attack probably second to none in the league. Complete scores:

Trinity 6 New 6 . . .
St. Mike's 13 Vic 1 . . .
Scarborough 28 Engineering 6

Soccer — L. Vanderstar scored five goals for Forestry as they dumped Woodsworth 7-0. Dave Lau and Chris Briggs got two each for Pharmacy as they defeated Meds B, 5-2. In other highlights Frank Dorst got the hat-trick while teammate Ray Nixon counted two in Wycliffe's 7-0 drubbing of the Trinity D Squad. Complete scores:

Wycliffe 7 Trinity (D) 0 . . .
U.C. (I) 4 Meds (A) 1 . . .
Law (I) 1 Trinity (B) 0 . . .
Pharmacy 5 Meds (B) 2 . . .
Forestry 6 Woodsworth 0 . . .
P.H.E. 7 New 0 . . .
Scarborough 2 Sr. Eng. 0 . . .
Law (II) 2 Knox 1 . . .
Arch 4 Landscape 0.

Lacrosse — The scoring was well spread among Scarborough's club when they annihilated Medicine 15-1. Gord Morris led the way with five, while John Capatelli and Gord Stellick got three each. There were quite a few penalties for such a one-sided affair with Scarborough getting 16 minutes to the Meds 9. Phys Ed, with five goals from Gord Nelson, defeated St. Mike's 13 to 10 and thus overshadowed a six goal performance by Mike's Ed Gal. Murray Barick also had six goals as Erindale embarrassed Vic 14 to 4. Complete scores:

Scarborough 15 Medicine 1 . . .
Forestry (A) 6 Trinity 0 . . .
P.H.E. 13 St. Mike's 10 . . .
Erindale 14 Vic 4.

Blues Defence Sinks Marauders

By HUGH STUART

On paper, it looked as if Saturday's Varsity Blues football game against the McMaster Marauders was going to be a rout. But that rout never materialized as the Blues' offence was held to only fourteen points in defeating the home team 14-6. It was not a poor Blues offence or a strong McMaster defense that held the score respectable; it was the weather.

The steady rain and swirling winds that prevailed throughout the game reduced what might have been an enjoyable but one-sided game into a dull but one-sided affair. Certainly the eight-point margin of victory cannot be taken at its face value as the Blues dominated the Marauders in every facet of the game.

The story of the game was the Blues' defensive line whose imitation of a brick wall was in stark contrast to last week's leaky performance against Laurier. The line of Angelo Castellani, Dave Yarmeluk, Erik Boss, and Ray Zarembo limited the McMaster rushers to a total of 59 yards and also put a strong rush on the Marauder quarterbacks.

Aided by two McMaster quarterbacks who would have trouble hitting the ground if they aimed for it, the rest of the Blues defence was equally stingy in giving up only one first down and twenty-one yards through the air. In fact, McMaster's best offensive weapon was the referees whose penalty calls accounted for all of the home team's first downs in the first half (two), and two of their four in the second half.

Despite the weather, the U of T offence turned in a creditable performance, piling up a total of 342 yards. Although footing was poor, the Blues' offensive line, particularly the right side, managed to punch some gaping holes in McMaster's defensive line. In a move designed to add some speed to the Blues' backfield, the coaches started back up quarterback Joe Hawco in the place of the injured Bob Hedges. That move paid dividends as Hawco got to the outside enough to emerge as the game's leading rusher with 66 yards. John Goodrow racked up 65 yards on the ground and although he has been suffering statistically of late, he turned in an impressive performance as a runner, blocker, and receiver. Feraday's favorite target was again Chris Kotsopoulos who had a strange afternoon, dropping a couple of easy balls and catching some hard ones. He also has gotten his 'Bill Barber' act together as his acting convinced the referees on a couple of questionable interference calls.

The first quarter was a lackluster affair as neither team was able to manufacture a drive. After trading punts, Paul McMillan put the Blues on the board with a sixty-one yard wind and bounce aided single. Near the end of the quarter the Blues began to get in gear, moving the ball to the Marauder twenty-one on the strength of two scrambles by Hawco. However, the drive stalled when Goodrow came two centimeters short of converting a third and two gamble. For a moment it looked as if the McMaster defensive stand had stirred their offence out of its lethargy, but any momentum was lost when a thirty-yard run by halfback Terry Brush was called back by the refs.

The second quarter opened with the Blues in possession of the ball at the Marauder forty-yard line. Feraday found Kotsopoulos open and hit him right on the money, but the receiver dropped a sure six points. Benefitting from some good punt returning, the Blues next thrust started from the Marauders' forty-yard line. Again the Blues came out empty as Mike Sokovinn missed on a twenty-six yard field goal attempt. The U of T defence again held, but because of a clipping penalty on the punt return the Blues emerged with their worst field position of the game. Ironically, it resulted in their only offensive touchdown.

Starting from their own twenty-five, Hawco utilized his throwing ability and hit Kotsopoulos with a 21-yard halfback option pass. A defensive interference call moved the ball further down field where Goodrow took over. He was the recipient of a pretty 26-yard pass from Feraday and two plays later took a pitch, fifteen yards to the one-yard line. He capped the drive with a one-yard plunge. Sokovinn added the convert and the 8-0 score stood until half time.

The first excitement of the third quarter occurred when Hawco threw his second half back option pass... right into the arms of McMaster's Tony Chris. Naturally, one series later, McMaster quarterback Mark Stubbart returned the favor by throwing the ball right to the Blues' Mike Shurny. Shurny showed his gratitude by sprinting fifty yards for a touchdown. The score stayed at 14-0 when the convert was missed.

Shurny's interception prompted Marauder assistant coach Bill Fowler to jokingly suggest from the spotter's booth, "Why don't we kick off instead of receive. We were doing better on defence."

Fowler proved to be prophetic because it was the McMaster defence that scored their only touchdown. The Blues were coasting along as a thirty-five yard pass to Kotsopoulos and an interference penalty moved the ball to the McMaster twenty. Dan Logan, who with Bob Perry had replaced Goodrow and Hawco in the backfield, ran up the middle to the twelve. Then Feraday went to Kotsopoulos once too often as defensive back Bob Hultgren stepped in front of the receiver and returned the interception 105 yards for a touchdown. The convert was missed making the score 14-6 with six minutes left in the game.

The Marauders got the ball twice more, both times in poor field position. New quarterback John Harrison, who supposedly had a better throwing arm than Stubbart, proved to be as inept as the man he replaced. A good pass rush from the Blues' defensive line did not help his cause either. Thankfully the game ended before he got a third chance to demonstrate his talents.

Next Saturday's game against the Windsor Lancers will feature a battle of two undefeated teams. While the Blues' final regular season game against the Western Mustangs is looked upon as the game to decide the division championship, the Blues cannot afford to look past Windsor. The Lancers defeated York 43-3 on Saturday and obviously sport a good offence. The Blues' victory over McMaster produced remedies for the two weaknesses that the Laurier game had exposed; the Blues' defence against the rush, and their lack of consistency in the offensive backfield. It should be an entertaining match.

IN CONCLUSION... Ross Tripp scored four touchdowns as Western kept their undefeated season in tact with a resounding 50-0 victory over winless Guelph. Windsor also boosted their record to 3-0 with a convincing 43-3 win over York. In Kitchener, Laurier captured the Bar-O-O trophy, dumping Waterloo 15-8. The Bar-O-O trophy is awarded to the winner of the annual contest between these two Kitchener-based schools.

In the Eastern division of the OQIFC, McGill trounced Concordia 51-6, while Ottawa got passed Queen's 15-11.

Back Up QB Assumes New Role

By JIM O'LEARY

The Varsity Blue coaching staff must be patting each other on the back after Joe Hawco's fine performance on Saturday afternoon. Hawco, who has been used as back up to quarterback Dan Feraday in the first two games of the season, started in the half back position against McMaster.

As offensive co-ordinator Dave Copp explained, Hawco was inserted to give the offence more speed. The decision to go with more speed was made after the Laurier game in which the Blue running attack was limited to under 100 yards. It was felt that speed was needed to compliment the running of John Goodrow.

The decision to insert Hawco was also made easier by the injury to Bob Hedges. The hard running Hedges has been plagued with injuries throughout the season and was forced to the sidelines for the McMaster game.

In Hawco it would appear, the coaches have found a more than adequate replacement.

Hawco was the game's leading rusher gaining 66 yards on 13 carries. One of these runs was a 37-yard romp which took the Blues into scoring territory.

Copp was beaming when reflecting on Hawco's 37-yard gainer after the game. To this point the long run had been absent in the Blues attack. Goodrow, the league's leading rusher going into Saturday's action, had not managed a run over ten yards.

Hawco also made an important contribution to the Blue's passing game. In the second quarter

Hawco took a pitch from Feraday and instead of running, hit Kotsopoulos with a 21-yard pass. This play initiated a drive which culminated in the Blues' only offensive touchdown.

Hawco is in his second year with the Blues but is only on his first year of eligibility because he did not dress for any games last season. The switch to running back is something new for the Sir John A MacDonald graduate.

Hawco came to the Blues as a quarterback and his only action for Toronto has been as a passer. He has come in to relieve Dan Feraday briefly in each of Toronto's first two games. His greatest claim to fame prior to Saturday's action was in directing a Toronto touchdown drive in Toronto's opening game against Waterloo.

Despite being inexperienced at the running back position, Hawco took up the challenge willingly after he was asked. The transition was not as hard for him as it might have been for any other player because as quarterback, he was already familiar with the running position.

Hawco was pleased with his own performance and expressed a liking for carrying the ball. He is the first to admit however, that he has still had plenty to learn. As he sees it the most difficult aspect of running the ball is reading the blockers. "No matter how good you are if you don't use your blockers properly you'll get killed," he stated.

Hawco claims that the adjustment to his new position was made a lot easier by the play of "our great line." As Hawco understates "the play of our offensive line makes it a lot easier for me."

Surprisingly the five-foot-ten inch Hawco does not find blocking a difficult task. He claims that blocking was a lot easier to pick up than running. His play throughout the game testifies to this view.

On the Blues' touchdown drive Hawco's blocking was particularly noticeable. On consecutive plays Hawco threw a good block on a rushing lineman to allow Feraday to complete a pass, led the blocking on a Goodrow run, threw a key block on a 46-yard pass to Goodrow, and threw a great block to allow Goodrow to turn the corner on a 15-yard run to the McMaster one-yard line. Goodrow scored on the next play from scrimmage.

The coaching staff was undoubtedly pleased with Hawco's performance. For the first game in a new position offensive coach Dave Copp felt "Joe played very well." Copp also revealed that the coaches had been contemplating using Hawco as running back since training camp. According to Copp, the poor performance against Laurier and the injury to Hedges only made easier a decision which was in the making for a long time.

Hawco is realistic when assessing his chances of finishing out the season at his new position. According to him "It will all depend on the coaches and how well I play."

If Saturday's play is any indication, Hawco should have no trouble getting the vote of confidence he needs from the coaches to continue playing.

Soccer Blues Lose

By GREG REEDS

On Friday September 23 the Varsity Soccer Blues travelled to Sudbury to begin their defence of the OUAA championship against the Laurentian Voyageurs. The game marked the opening of the 1977 Intercollegiate soccer season for both teams.

The Voyageurs started strongly, opening the scoring early in the game. The goal resulted from an unassisted effort by a Laurentian player.

The Blues rallied to tie the score before the end of half on a goal by forward Yannis Vasilou. Vasilou was quick to jump on a Laurentian mistake to turn a loose ball into a goal.

The Blues jumped into the lead early in the second half on a nice goal by freshman Chris Lasorich. A third Varsity goal was disallowed because of an offside call.

The disallowed goal seemed to buoy the spirits of the Laurentian squad and was followed by a shift in momentum to Laurentian's favour. The Voyageurs tied the score on a penalty kick.

The Voyageurs scored the winning goal with 15 minutes left in the game. From there the Blues were left with an uphill battle to salvage a tie.

The Blues mounted considerable pressure in the closing minutes but time ran out before they could overcome the one goal disadvantage.

The Blues host the University of Guelph Gryphons at Varsity Stadium on Wednesday. Kick-off time is 8:00. Coach Bob Nicol will be looking for fan support to help the Blues in their attempt to recapture the coveted OUAA soccer championship.

Student enrolment up at Erindale

By SA'AD A. SAIDULLAH

The admission cutoff standard for Erindale College was lowered by 2 per cent this year to accommodate an extra 200 students in the first year class.

William Kent, Director of Admissions, indicated in an interview yesterday that the 65 per cent cut-off rate might not necessarily represent a decline in academic standards at the suburban college. The rate, however, represents a significant deviation from the 76 per cent cut-off point for science students or the 74 per cent cut-off standard for humanities students at the St. George campus.

The number of students indicating Erindale as their college of first preference has declined from 1,827 last year to 1,780 this year.

It is learned from reliable sources at the college that pressure from Simcoe Hall was at least partially responsible for decreasing the cut-off rate. The additional revenue made available to universities by the Ontario Ministry of Colleges & Universities for every extra student enrolled at universities is said to have been the inducement.

M. H. Cooper, Registrar at Erindale, says a 2 per cent decline is "not very significant given the upturn in Canadian high-school standards this year due to public pressure." Cooper added that the "university felt we needed so many students, 3,700 students. It was our best judgement."

In response to questions about a reduction in academic standards being in conflict with Dean Desmond Morton's New New programme which calls for a drastic, upward re-formulation of academic requirements at Erindale, standards much higher than those at the St. George campus,

Cooper stated: "There is a potential problem. But it is hard to say what it might be."

John Doherty, SAC External Affairs Commissioner and an Erindale student, said: "The reduction in applicants giving Erindale as their first choice gives the lie to Dean Morton's claim that Erindale has started to attract very superior students. He expressed concern that the New New programme was being pushed to increase enrolment at Erindale rather than because of purely academic reasons."

"The government's treatment of universities and the lack of future job prospects partly explains the decline," said Brian O'Riordan, SAC University Government Commissioner. He felt that there is a particular lack of proper guidance counselling in high schools. "That is related to the larger question of philosophy; some people, specially in academic circles, see the purpose of the university as a means of personal enrichment while others see it as a way to get a job."

While universities downplay the importance of the decline in the admission cut-off rate and the number of applicants, they point out that the uneven spread of the high enrolment has created problems. Cooper said, "The problem is in departments. Enrolment is up 50 per cent in Commerce 100, it is up substantially in French and Communications, and math classes are huge."

Kent, however, says that Erindale students have a relatively high conversion rate of full time students to part-time status and the university has to ensure that it has a favourable enrolment in late October when it provides records to the Ministry for its annual funding.

Libraries may close up earlier

By JOHN D'ANGELO

Robarts Library may be the only U of T library open after 10:30 p.m. Mondays through Thursdays, and after 6 p.m. on Fridays and Sundays, if proposals set out at last Monday's meeting of the University Advisory Committee on the Library System are adopted. Such stringent measures might be necessary to relieve a total operating deficit of between $120,000 and $150,000 expected this year, the fourteen committee members were told.

Spending cutbacks have already been initiated at the beginning of the school year at Fort Book, and next to feel the pinch on spending will be the Science and Medicine, Sigmund Samuel, Engineering, Hygiene, and Pharmacy libraries. As of September 12, coat-checking has been voluntary at Robarts, exit control staff has been reduced, photocopying service hours have been curtailed, and other minor economies have been introduced in hopes of saving some $53,000 of the operating over-expenditure.

The budgetary allowance provided by the university to the library system has always fallen short of the expenditures realized, Vice-Provost Milton Israel said. Traditionally the extra money needed has been tapped from other budgets. The $62,000 over-expenditure of last year, was appropriated from the university's supplementary budget, but this year there will be no supplementary grants available, he said.

In a letter sent to Israel, from Robert Blackburn, Chief Librarian, five cutback proposals were outlined, all of them leading to a reduction in library hours. The possibilities delineated were:

- Closing all libraries on Sundays (saving $58,999), or closing all libraries except Robarts at 6 p.m. on Sundays (saving $23,078);

- Closing all libraries at 6 p.m. on Fridays (saving $31,582) or closing all libraries except Robarts at 6 p.m. on Fridays (saving $26,772);

- Closing Med Sci, Sig Sam, Engineering at 10:30 p.m. Monday through Thursday (saving $14,520).

Since a minimum further reduction of expenditures of $44,000 will be necessary, the letter recommends that the early weekday closures and the weekend closures excluding Robarts be implemented, which would meet the target with what is felt to be the least inconvenience to readers. This combination is expected to affect less than 25 per cent of the study space occupied those evenings, and only 2.79 per cent of the book loans transacted at those libraries.

If further cutbacks are needed, the next step might be to close even the Robarts at 6 p.m. on Friday and Sunday. This would impinge on 3.42 per cent of the loans made at Robarts, and displace the 350 to 400 people usually occupying the library during those hours.

The question was brought up at the meeting as to whether all the possible trimmings of staff and services leaving library hours unaffected have been made. Phil Ryan, undergraduate representative of the Planning and Resources Committee, spoke out in an incisive opposition to the proposals, stating that "we are not faced with an all or nothing situation."

Ryan feels that as much as 80 per cent of the proposed savings could be achieved by operating the libraries with a bare minimum of services (such as using only one entrance and not reshelving books) during those hours where the libraries, under current proposals, would otherwise be closed. He especially feels that evening closing of the Short Term Loan section of the Sig Sam library will be very inconvenient to students who are using it more and more to avoid buying expensive textbooks.

Students may be faced by lines like these at Sig Sam if U of T libraries close Sundays at 6 pm. Robarts may be the exception.

Ryan's counter proposals precipitated the establishment of a subcommittee, consisting of Ryan, Blackburn, M. Hutchinson, Associate Librarian of Reader Services, and M. McGugan, SAC representative, who will investigate the costs saved in major service cutbacks, and will report back for next Monday's full committee meeting when a final decision has to be made. In that way students applying for part-time work and regular staff can be notified, and time tables made up before October 12, the date when the regular winter library hours are introduced.

$200 theft at ASSU: more crime at U of T

Vandals have struck at the Arts and Sciences Student Union (ASSU). Last weekend more than $200 was stolen out of the cash box in the ASSU office in Sidney Smith Hall.

ASSU fieldworker Terry Weatherhead found the money missing Monday afternoon when she entered the office. Two U of T police arrived on the scene to carry out an investigation last Monday night, but the crime was not solved. Two more U of T police, unaware of the visit of the first two, claimed Sid Smith was their beat and also proceeded to carry out an investigation. Yesterday, Weatherhead was visited by two plainclothes policemen wearing trench coats and sunglasses. A passing student entered and asked what the plainclothesmen were doing.

Weatherhead says she has been told Metro police will come to fingerprint the cash box. There were no signs of searching in the ASSU office, she said.

As ASSU is not insured the theft will be counted as a loss.

Lust not a motive for rapists

By GILLIAN O'REILLY

Rape is an important issue for women because it encapsulates and symbolizes all the hardships that women have had to bear. So said Rosemary Volpe of the Toronto Rape Crisis Centre at an informal discussion held at Hart House on Monday under the auspices of the Student Council's (SAC) Women's Commission.

Volpe and Diana Weisen, also from the Centre, led an interested and enthusiastic group of approximately twenty women in a discussion of the myths surrounding rape and rapists, the difficulties a victim faces and the question of how to deal with the situation.

Rape is not a sexual crime motivated by overwhelming lust, the group was told. It is a "violently aggressive act intended to humiliate and degrade the victim." The traditional view of women as passive objects makes them the natural targets.

Rape is an extreme statement of the conquering male and submissive female myth, said Volpe. Thus it symbolizes all the role stereotyping which women are fighting.

Asked for a picture of the average rapist, Volpe replied: "Talk to the boy next door." Most rapists have some acquaintance with their victims, she said. The majority of convicted offenders are between the ages of 19 and 30, the years of experimentation in the roles of adult masculinity.

However, many rape cases still go unreported because of the victim's feelings of guilt or fear of the lengthy and difficult legal proceedings.

Efforts are being made to remove rape from the Criminal Code and reclassify it under assault, said Volpe. This step would go far in dispelling the concept of rape as a sexual crime with the accompanying implication of the victim's guilt. Such a move would also enable a husband to be charged with raping his wife, a crime not recognized at present.

Volpe and Weisen did not favor "gimmicks" like mace or batons as defence weapons. Such measures could be used against the victim and they do not deal with the problem at the root, they said. Both women also scorned the notion that a woman should play up to the attacker "because all rapists just want to be loved." Many of the participants spoke enthusiastically of self-defense courses.

A change in the roles of men and women is necessary to deal with the problem at its source. At present, said Weisen, women must find a median between the constant necessity for caution and the desire to live one's own life.

The three-year-old Rape Crisis Centre is composed of three paid staff and many volunteers, whose activities range from counselling to fund-raising. The Centre's funds come from the City of Toronto or private donations. It is hoped that the proposed Social Services Act will provide some federal aid.

The Centre offers a 24-hour answering service. Its staff help rape victims deal with the medical and legal aspects of a case, and provide counselling and referral services.

The SAC Women's Commission, headed by Carolyn Caldwell, is hoping to hold more such seminars on a variety of women's issues.

$3,000 gone from safe

By JILL SPRACKMAN

On September 4, before students arrived back at U of T, a safe was discovered open with $3,000 missing at the School of Continuing Studies on St. George Street. Gordon Huff, Manager of Protective Services and Communications Divisions, said it was the biggest theft at U of T in seven and a half years. According to Huff, it is possible that a U of T employee cracked the safe. Metro police are investigating the case at present because the amount stolen exceeds $100.

"If it wasn't someone who knew the combination, then it was a professional thief who knew how to open safes. It is also possible that the safe was left unlocked," said Huff. Most of the stolen money was registration fees, taken sometime over Labor Day weekend during off hours.

Huff's Division includes Security, Fire Protection, Radiation Protection and Communications. There are forty-three police on the U of T police force, three of whom are women. Huff himself was a military policeman in the army before assuming his post at U of T.

"The most common type of criminal activity at the U of T is petty theft," said Huff. The university is right in the middle of Toronto, he stated, and with a substantial student population that permits strangers to walk through the grounds, it is impossible to know who is and isn't a member of the U of T community, said Huff.

"Bicycle thefts have been a problem in the past, but it seems the campus police have a good record for last year and this year. Last year bicycle thefts were cut by 66 per cent," said Huff.

There have been no murders or stabbings at U of T, according to Huff. About three years ago there was a rape scare, in which the Metro police were called in to assist. An escort service for women was provided but was discontinued due to insufficient demand for the service, said Huff.

Huff feels there is a general misunderstanding around the campus that the U of T police are "security guards".

"Each officer is sworn in as a Peace Officer and has the power to arrest anyone who they think is suspected of having committed an offence." The campus police also have the right of search and seizure, he said and have the authority of any other police force within the campus.

There are three plainclothes police on the force, but Huff pointed out that they are not "undercover". The purpose of having plainclothes police is to enable them to move about more freely and be unobtrusive, he said.

Some of the police on the force have had previous experience, and the rest were required to take courses at community colleges. According to Huff, "they are then taught to be more flexible and to become more service oriented." There is no hard and fast rule with regards to height and weight, however U of T police "usually conform to the standards of other police forces," said Huff.

Universities are in for it

By JACKIE LONDON

Universities may face their most disastrous year in 1978-9, warned William Winegard, the new chairman of the Ontario Council of University Affairs (OCUA) at an interview yesterday.

Several clues have enabled him to make this "guess-timate" he said.

In conversation with Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, Winegard found Parrott "sad and discouraged" about the little money available to him. Provincial Treasurer Darcy McKeough has been reported as saying he planned to balance the provincial budget within three years to get rid of its deficit. Winegard interprets this as a sign that universities, hospitals and secondary schools will suffer equally. Most ominous, says Winegard, is the fact that OCUA's most recent recommendations have not been approved as yet.

These recommendations, according to a highly placed source within the OCUA, deal with the total funding figure for the university system for 78-79, the Ontario graduate scholarship program, and a refinement of the OCUA's previous capital programs. The new plan downplays the new building facilities and recommends that money be spent on renovations and repairs.

In spite of some of serious problems predicted for 78-79, Winegard indicated solutions for a number of difficulties.

● The Royal Conservatory of Music is teetering on the edge of insolvency in spite of the fact it is technically eligible for a $200,000 per year government subsidy. According to U of T president John Evans the money is being withheld because the Conservatory joined as a self-supporting body and should remain that way.

Winegard said OCUA members have been made aware of the Conservatory situation. The matter has been presented directly by U of T to Parrott. If a solution is not found he said, OCUA is prepared to go into action at once on the matter.

● Funded in 1965, Scarborough College had a construction plan to gradually build facilities for 5,000 students. When Davis announced in 1972 a freeze in construction plans, Scarborough's 3,500 students were left with luxurious athletic facilities, a kitchen fit for 5,000 that is now partly rusting for disuse, and no offices or library. Its books are stored in basements, houses, shelves and garages according to last year's dean Peter Salus.

Despite the freeze on buildings, Winegard IGNORE

Winegard said despite the freeze on buildings, Scarborough can get itself a new building for a library under the OCUA recommendation which states that in the matter of "new construction that adds to institutional space," the only projects eligible are "those which remedy a serious space deficiency in facilities relating to particular activities or functions."

● Because of the tight budget for education, smaller universities fear extinction. Yet these institutions mean a great deal to the cities where they are located. It is felt by some that the province needs geographical distribution of universities.

Winegard said if the government had known 15 years ago what it knows today, many of the smaller universities would not have been built. Those built would in some cases have been situated in different areas. Now that the universities are there, the government "would not wipe them out" if there is a way to avoid doing so, he stated.

Students from the large centres finding there are no more openings at local universities will receive counselling to help them find a niche in smaller universities with vacancies, he said.

The smaller universities will be encouraged to turn to adult part-time education. In the last 20 years, the pressing problem was to accommodate students in the 18-24 age bracket. As this pressure is easing, he said, there is a possibility the drop in enrolment could be compensated for by part-time student enrolment.

Because of past OCUA recommendations, universities are not funded according to all of their needs and do not have all their funds withheld according to their drops so that equalization occurs, said Winegard. The monies are averaged over three year spans to ease the "down curves" in OCUA's "Formula Sensitivity to Undergraduate Enrolment Change". In addition, stated Winegard, each year's allowance is based on the previous year's undergraduate enrolment.

Not much ado with U of T police

By JILL SPRACKMAN

At 9:10 pm last Friday, a roving reporter left the Spadina Street station to accompany two U of T police constables on their evening patrol.

Joe Guilfoyle is in his second year on the force, and had been a policeman for 13½ years before arriving at U of T. Bill Forson has been with the campus police for seven years, and had no previous experience on a police force.

The first adventure of the night occurred in answer to a call from Control about some activity around the Royal Ontario Museum-Philosophers Walk area. The car sped down Bloor St. and screeched into the driveway only to find a couple in full embrace in that area.

The next call led us to Annesley Hall where a young man was lying on the front lawn. At first he seemed in great trouble, but it turned out that he was slightly inebriated and wished only for some fresh air. U of T police left him to his business.

A detour was made to the Dentistry Building to check out a call on a flood. The deluge proved to be only a slight leak in a sterilizing machine.

Other events during the evening consisted of a prowling along Philosophers Walk to check on strange activity, moving a car that was blocking a laneway, checking a safe and properly closing doors that had been left unlocked.

Officers Guilfoyle and Forson kept apologizing for the slow night, but it did provide an insight into what actually goes on in a patrol car. The strangest feeling came from the stares of onlookers who suspected the reporter in the back seat of the car of being a criminal.

"If I'm elected Prime Minister of Canada I'll appoint you ambassador to Uganda."

John Evans in a letter in reply to OCUA Chairman William Winegard's request for a "cushy government job."

DIVIDE AND RULE

A principle that over the ages has consistently proved itself correct is the one that says "Divide and Conquer".

The new government policy on university funding and the graduate school funding scheme being proposed by a group of U of T professors may yet confirm the principle once again.

The new government policy, unveiled by U of T President John Evans in his first speech this year before Governing Council, commits the government to a funding method based on "quality" instead of enrolment. Evans is confident that this will enable U of T finances to stay on an even keel in the next few years while allowing academic standards to be maintained at their present level. At a recent Hart House luncheon with student council presidents he went so far as to say he is slightly "optimistic" about U of T's future.

A week after Evans made his Governing Council speech The Varsity learned that a policy similar to the one adopted by the government for undergraduate funding is being put forward by a group of U of T professors as the desired policy for graduate school funding. Again the emphasis would be on "quality" rather than enrolment. If the policy is implemented U of T expects to become the biggest university for graduate studies.

While U of T is looking after itself, smaller universities will be finding it hard to survive, let alone maintain their academic standards. The U of T administration seems quite unconcerned about this. In fact the attitude one detects in the official pronouncements so far is one of relief.

The provincial government must find this very satisfying. Here at last is a way to make cutbacks palatable. Give the available revenue to the big universities; let the small ones bite the dust.

One does not expect any better from the government but it is galling to watch U of T do the government's work with such readiness.

Of course there's always the argument that universities like Lakehead, Laurentian, Brock and Trent no longer have any reason to exist and should be shut down. As some would argue only the fittest should survive. That however would be like saying that adults are fitter than children and that this gives adults a stronger right to exist. The smaller universities are also the younger ones. They were started at a time when it was believed that enrolment would increase forever. Now that the predictions have proved false, now that it has been proven that government made a mistake, the small universities are being asked to pay for it.

The implication here is that universities are no better than processing factories. When the demand for the finished product is high you open new plants, when demand slacks off you shut down the smaller branches and concentrate on the more "efficient" plants.

In going along with government U of T is tacitly admitting that the "processing plant" view of the university is also its own view. In the short term this might prove profitable. Over a longer period of time the university may discover that it has contributed to its own demise.

Student finally roused to kick the Varg

I have finally been aroused to express my opposition to your hollow militarism as I see it in your September 23 editorial ("Parrot vs Who?"). What are you trying to prove by lamenting the fact that Ontario students are not as militant as students in Spain, Italy or Thailand? For heaven's sake: give me a repressive government which really attacks my most fundamental civil liberties and then I too just might be motivated to go out and get myself shot up (you will surely agree that nothing helps militant action more than some nice, healthy martyrdom). But the Ontario situation is rather more complex; you will get nowhere until you realize that the Ontario Government really is in tune with the populace it represents, and believe it or not, with a large proportion (too many) of the student population. If you address yourself to this point, you might arouse some people to question what they themselves are doing here at university, why they are here; and with some valid answers from some students, we just might come up with a valid response to the government's education policies.

It is easy for us to argue that Dr. Parrott is subscribing to the very popular notion that university is a glorified vocational school: four years and we are out to fend for ourselves in the real world. Do many students really disagree with this view? Okay, it takes six or seven years to get through medical school, but the professional faculties are nevertheless popular with students because the student is assured of a marketable skill when he leaves U of T; it is worth going into debt for a few years because the vocation is worth a certain amount in material comfort to him over the long run. Too many of us lowly Arts and Science students are crying "unfair, our four years have been wasted" because we cannot as easily fit ourselves into a comfortable slot in our very materialistic society.

I only wish that we could see ourselves through this battlefield of dollars and cents in which we see the Varsity, SAC and OFS taking on that nasty Ontario Government. I would really like to see, as you point out, the elimination of tuition fees, for the simple reason that it would open up to as many people who can really appreciate it an institution of learning. What I do not want to see is hollow militarism, the appeal to the "new left", the idealism of the 1960's. What we really need is someone to teach students, the community, and the government that learning is not a four-years-and-you-are-out assembly line process; but rather, that it is invaluable, a privilege, which not every student wants to or is able to take up.

Learning by its very nature involves many sacrifices to material comfort and security. It is too bad that the Government looks upon the universities as a "lark", an expensive way to keep Ontario's bigger "children" off the streets for another few years. It is also too bad that you are intent on taking the Government on at this childish level.

Chambers protests

I forbore to write protesting the butchery of sense and tense perpetrated by the editors of The Varsity on my article in last Wednesday's issue, but Professor Gauthier's letter prompts my reply. I hope that this at least will be published as I wrote it.

I did not commit the nonsense of assigning the statement about Greek and Arab societies to Professor Lee. Had The Varsity printed what I wrote the context alone would have made that plain. The remark about Professor Gauthier's apparent reversal on the presence of Jews and Communists in classrooms was followed by: "The audience seemed to miss that one as they did Gauthier's identification of such homosexually-oriented societies as the ancient Greeks and the Arabs with the oppression of women. (Lee might have made the point that in that case homosexually-oriented societies were necessary for the rise of philosophy or mathematics.) And in the context of the debate as a whole and Socrates's known sexual proclivities, Gauthier's quotation from Mill that Socrates unsatisfied was preferable to a fool satisfied, seemed strangely out of place as a final summing-up for the "eyes".

As for the '19', I apologize to Professor Gauthier for my typographical error. It did not, however, alter the outcome of the debate.

Students getting ripped-off by ad

Re the advertisement for The Jean Store on page in the Friday, Sept. 23 issue of the Varsity:

This ad reads that upon presentation of "your student card" a 10 per cent discount will be given. My experience and that of several other students in the store does not seem to be true. We were asked to present a Jean Store "10 per cent Discount Card" and were not given discounts on our purchases.

How can "student card" be defined as anything else other than a student card?

I believe that The Jean Store is misleading U of T students.

Please correct the ad or warn U of T students about getting ripped-off.

Hands off free speech area!

As one of the clubs that regularly sets up literature tables in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall, the Trotskyist League (U of T Club) noted with great interest an article in the 21 September Varsity "Lobby sees changes", which outlines some of the new regulations regarding poster and literature displays in the building. Our club started to receive harassment from the Dean's office towards the end of last year. On a number of occasions, after having arranged literature displays on tables set up adjacent to (but certainly not interfering with) the flow of traffic in the building near the St. George entrance, we were approached by Richard Brott from the Dean's office, who insisted that the tables be moved off to the sides of the lobby, away from the path of most students. In addition, our posters, as those of other left-wing groups, have repeatedly been torn down within hours of being put up.

When we arrived back on campus this year, the lobby was for the first couple of weeks cluttered with the wares of an art print firm, leaving virtually no room for campus clubs to set up displays. The print sale over, last year's large mobile tables had been replaced by seven small tables which are actually chained to the walls, ostensibly to prevent theft. This harassment, and the information in the Varsity, prompted us to visit the office of Richard Brott, the "special" assistant to the Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science, in order to procure a copy of the new regulations for ourselves.

Mr. Brott, in attempting to explain the "rationale" behind the new regulations, made some illuminating remarks. Regarding the blatantly racist regulation that insists "Notices must be in English although other languages may also be used", Brott quipped that he himself found it a rather strange rule, and explained that Dean Churcher wants to be able to read them himself to make sure that there aren't any in a foreign language inciting students to riot! He then added, intending to be ironic, that perhaps Dean Churcher would not object if the notices were in Afrikaans, apparently a language he does understand! It is ironic indeed that the posters advertising our recent forum on South Africa, with the slogans "Destroy Apartheid! Open the Road to Workers Revolution!" disappeared with even far greater frequency from the boards of Sid Smith than even those advertising our Marxist class series.

The rule restricting what language posters are to use is only one of many that restrict the size, number, nature and location of posters. And if these bureaucratic restrictions are not adequate enough to enforce censorship, one of the new regulations renders them meaningless anyway. Rule 6 reads "The faculty reserves the right to remove any notice at any time for any reason or to alter its position of posting." This makes the decision of the Dean totally arbitrary, offering groups no protection whatsoever of their democratic right to freedom of speech. Not only can posters be removed at the whim of the Dean, but "offenders" of the new regulations can be fined and prosecuted for attempting to exercise their democratic rights!

Access to literature tables in the foyer will from now on "normally be restricted to representatives of groups which have been recognized by the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council." These new regulations are clearly aimed at left-wing political organizations. While two-bit hucksters of all sorts have all the access they want to the student body — from print salesmen to the Canadian Armed Forces which recruits on campus, left groups have already for years been restricted to the Sid Smith foyer to set up tables. Those who were at U of T in the early seventies will remember that there has not always been a free speech area on campus. The lobby in Sid Smith became a free speech area (and the stacks in Robarts library were opened up) as the result of militant student occupations. Now these gains, which were won through hard struggle are being reversed in a reactionary move by the Dean's office. All those who defend democratic rights must oppose the new regulations. HANDS OFF THE FREE SPEECH AREA!

Stop banking on apartheid

For most University of Toronto students the apartheid system of South Africa is a distant, if nonetheless horrible, reality. The horrors of the system have been well documented and they require no further explanation. The recent murder of moderate black student leader Steve Biko, the latest in a series of some fifty recent such eliminations, merely confirms what has long been an internationally held judgement on the policies of South Africa. Among democratic men and women of all nationalities and all races apartheid is known as the system that denies the non-white peoples of South Africa their basic human rights. And the white minority government that built this system is known as the brutal suppressor of all those who organize against its racist authoritarianism.

Our distance from the day to day realities of this system is deceptive; many of the forces that provide apartheid with its economic lifeline are centrally involved in our daily lives. Apartheid survives because of the phenomenally large amount of international capital which is annually invested in the South African economy. According to Prime Minister John Vorster each new investment, each new trade agreement, "is another brick in the wall of our continued existence." Many of these bricks have been supplied by Canada's largest corporations: Massey-Ferguson, Alcan, Falconbridge, Ford Canada, Inco, Consolidated Bathurst and Sun Life.

Every wall must be built on a solid foundation. Apartheid's wall rests, as the South African business journal, The Financial Mail, so aptly explains, upon a foundation of direct financial loans to the white minority government. Without such loans South Africa would be unable "to finance its traditional current account deficits" and its economy would quickly collapse.

In the period since the Soweto inspired protests of June 1976 these loans have become all the more important to the health of apartheid. Many prospective investors have been frightened away from South African markets and South Africa now faces a growing balance of payments crisis. Only massive loans from Western banking consortia, loans totalling close to two billion dollars, have prevented the apartheid regime from going into bankruptcy.

Four Canadian banks — the Bank of Montreal, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, the Royal Bank, the Toronto-Dominion Bank — have been involved in these consortia. The Task Force on Churches' and Corporate Responsibility, an ecumenical group representing six major Canadian churches, has discovered that consortia containing these banks have tendered two loans to the South African government that have directly contributed to the financing of the South African armed forces. One of these loans, a two hundred million dollar transaction with the state owned Electricity Supply Commission, was utilized in the purchase of nuclear reactors, thus advancing South Africa's capability to field nuclear weaponry. And this is only the tip of the iceberg.

The University of Toronto has invested nearly two and one-half million dollars in stocks in these four banks. Every financial quarter it receives dividends from these stocks, dividends that are partially accumulated from the banks' loans to South Africa. In short, the University of Toronto is profiting from the maintenance of apartheid.

Last spring two of Canada's leading Africanists, University of Toronto Professors M. Klein and C. Pratt, introduced a motion to the Governing Council subcommittee that focused upon endowment fund investments. In it they asked the university to censor the four banks for their loans to the South African government. When the history of the treatment of Klein's and Pratt's proposal written it will be one of the shabbiest chapters in the history of the University of Toronto. Not only did the administration decide that it was unwilling that the university take even the most minimal action in regards to the four banks, but it also had such a position endorsed by the Business Affairs Committee of the Governing Council through a process that dishonoured the democratic traditions of this university.

A few short illustrations of the process by which this issue was resolved will suffice to demonstrate this latter assertion. First, one of the persons chosen for the subcommittee that reviewed the question was a white emigre South African who did not even maintain the slightest pretense of objectivity;

the campus media reports of the subcommittee's first meeting were filled with racially prejudiced quotations from this individual. Secondly, a crucial meeting of the subcommittee was cancelled with very short prior notice and no explanation. A student brief in support of the Klein-Pratt proposal was to have been delivered at this meeting, but its sponsors were never informed of the rescheduled meeting and the brief was thus never brought before the subcommittee. Thirdly, the final decision on the Klein-Pratt proposal was delayed until the campus media had ceased publication for the summer, until most students and staff were deeply in end of the term papers and examinations, and until the student organizations were in administrative transition. The purpose of such a delay was clear: it made it impossible to mobilize student and staff opinion against the decision and the decision making process. These actions speak for themselves: a decision made through violations of democratic processes has no legitimacy. At the same time that the University of Toronto was failing to even verbally reprimand the four banks, other North American universities began to take the precedent making decision of withdrawing their endowment funds from corporations investing in South Africa. The entire University of Wisconsin system — comprising several campuses — is selling all of its stocks portfolio that falls within this category, as is Canada's University of Manitoba. It is no longer acceptable practice for universities to "bank on apartheid."

By consciously refusing to censor the four Canadian banks currently financing the South African government the Business Affairs Committee has made the University of Toronto knowingly complicit in the maintenance of the apartheid system. This complicity is completely unacceptable to the Graduate Students' Union. We call upon all staff and all students, undergraduate and graduate, who share our sentiments to attend an organizational meeting of the Committee to Stop Bank Loans to South Africa on Wednesday September 28 at 4 PM in the International Student Centre.

Vice-President,

VUSAC needs five

By JOHN CAMERON

This Friday sees the balloting in the September version of the twice-yearly Victoria University Student Administrative Council (VUSAC) elections.

If the number of candidates is significant, then this election should prove fascinating. With thirteen aspiring politicians vying for only five positions, the voters will surely be faced with a tough decision at the polls.

The five positions still undecided are all those of members at large on VUSAC. The elected persons will be appointed to act as assistants to the various commissioners on VUSAC. Two of the five elected must be in their first year, thereby giving the frosh of Vic representation on VUSAC.

The position of services commissioner became vacant over the summer since the elections held last spring. As Susan Bertoia was the only candidate, she has already been acclaimed.

The polls will be open this Friday from 9:00 to 5:00 at Wymwood, Pratt Library, Old Vic, Emmanuel, New Academic Building, Burwash Hall and Annesley Hall.

Prospective voters will be provided with statements from each of the candidates on Friday at the polling stations. These statements will provide information on each candidate and his/her views on the issues.

Computer cards go to polls

SCARBOROUGH (CUP) — Students at Centennial College won't get ballots when they go to the polls Oct. 3, 4 and 5 to vote for a student union president and six representatives — instead, they'll be handed computer cards.

In what may be a first in Canada, people will vote for the candidate of their choice by filling in computer cards which will be fed through the campus computer.

Bob Gordon, who is running the election, says the main advantage is security — every card is numbered and students must sign voting lists as they cast their cards and the machine will be programmed to reject unauthorized cards.

And while the computer counts the votes, it will also analyze how many students voted at each of the college's three campuses, what percentages of voters were men, women, first-year and returning students and what program they are enrolled in.

The analysis and counting is to take 10 minutes — Gordon says the longest part of the procedure will be picking up cards from each of the campuses and getting them to the computer. He says that it would take a group of people several days to count votes and analyze voting patterns, with less accuracy than the computer will provide.

"We could even tell how many people wore blue underwear if they wanted to fill it out on the cards," Gordon added. However, there are no plans to include such a question on the ballots.

Spies in their eyes: the CIA in the news

WASHINGTON (CUP) — Former Washington Post reporter Carl Bernstein is charging that several members of the United States Senate conspired with high CIA officials last year to conceal from the full Senate and American public the extensive links between the American news media and the Central Intelligence Agency.

Bernstein, in a copyrighted story to be published next month in Rolling Stone, says more than 400 American journalists — some of them household names — have secretly worked with the CIA during the past 25 years.

Bernstein adds much information about this alleged press-CIA involvement would likely have come out during Senate investigations last year had it not been for meetings between Senator Frank Church of Idaho and high agency officials.

Bernstein, who with Bob Woodward helped uncover much of the Watergate cover-up, said in his report that Church and Senator John Tower of Texas dined with three top CIA officials and discussed, according to Bernstein's sources, methods of preventing public disclosures about the CIA's use of reporters to recruit spies abroad and even to funnel agency money to foreign political groups.

"Journalists provided a full range of clandestine services — from simple intelligence collection to serving as go-betweens with spies in communist countries," he wrote.

Such news executives as the late Henry Luce of Time, the late Arthur Hays Sulzberger of the New York Times, the late Philip Graham of the Washington Post and the late James Copley of the Copley News Service, lent "their co-operation to the agency," Bernstein wrote.

He also said U.S. journalists assigned to cover Chile during the 1960s assisted the CIA in its efforts to disrupt and defeat the electoral campaign then being waged by Salvador Allende. Much of the "wire service copy coming from Chile during this period contained CIA 'black propaganda' (untrue assertions and fabricated reports)," Bernstein added.

CONFERENCE PARTICIPANT: WRITER-IN-RESIDENCE CAROL BOLT

WRITERS' CONFERENCE AT HART HOUSE

Free tickets will be distributed at the Hart House Porter's Desk beginning Saturday, October 1st for the partially SAC-funded Writers-In-Residence Conference. The Hart House Library Committee will host the two-day conference on Wednesday, October 19th and Thursday, October 20th.

The conference will feature Carol Bolt, the 1977-78 University of Toronto writer-in-residence, Margaret Atwood, W.O. Mitchell, Adele Wiseman, Joseph Skvorecky, Fletcher Markle, John Newlove, Jack Ludwig and Robert Finch. There is a limit of 2 tickets per person per evening.

The Conference, which is jointly sponsored by SAC, the Ontario Arts Council and the Canada Council, will examine the experience of former U of T writers-in-residence and the influence of writer-in-residence programmes on creative writing on campus. It will include afternoon panel discussions, evening readings and informal receptions. The October 19th Seminar, starting in the Hart House Music Room at 2:00 p.m., will host Carol Bolt, Margaret Atwood, Jack Ludwig and John Newlove. Poet Eli Mondell, Professor of Canadian Literature at York University, will moderate this Seminar. Fletcher Markle, W.O. Mitchell, Joseph Skvorecky and Adele Wiseman will be in the Music Room at Hart House on October 20th also starting at 2:00 p.m. Sam Solecki, Professor of Canadian Literature at St. Michael's College will moderate. There will be readings in the Great Hall on both evenings starting at 8:00 p.m.

This joint Sesquicentennial project is open to all members of the university community and to the general public. If you are looking for an intensely rewarding two days, be sure to stop by Hart House and pick up your tickets.

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED

SAC Education Commissioner Marjan Glavac is looking for volunteers on all three campuses.

Once again, the Students' Administrative Council is organizing Preview Day, a High School Liaison Program designed to introduce secondary school students to the University of Toronto and its programmes.

One of the major problems faced by many students thinking of coming to the U of T is a way to base their decision on concrete observation rather than on glorified insights of "official publications". Preview Day was started by SAC to help solve this common problem.

The nature of Preview Day will be as diverse and unique as the individuals participating. Therefore you (and you and you) are all needed. If you wish to impart your view and share a bit of yourself with a high school student, leave your name and phone number at the SAC office. Take a grade 13 student to classes and show him or her around the campus for one day during the week of October 31st to November 4th. You'll be surprised how much you'll learn.

GET OKTOBERFEST TICKETS EARLY

The wise and thoughtful Oktoberfest merrymaker will be sure to get his or her ticket for the October 7th blowout early. Planned for the St. George Front Campus, the Oktoberfest is a celebration of sausages, sauerkraut, beer, games and beguilements. Oktoberfest hats and T-Shirts will also be available, so don't be despondent if you have nothing quite right to wear.

Admission to the festivities is free between the hours of 1 p.m. and 6 p.m. But remember: you won't be admitted into the main tent for beer, Oom-pah-pah music or the other treats which begin at 7 p.m. unless you have bought an Oktoberfest ticket beforehand. Tickets are on sale now at $2.50 a person at the SAC and Engineering offices. Only 2,000 tickets are available, so don't be late or you might miss out on the fun of Oktoberfest.

Be assured that this year there is no danger of running out of beer.

A VERY IMPORTANT DATE

Even though Dr. Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, has inconveniently scheduled his Public Meeting on Student Aid for Seneca College, 1750 Finch Avenue East, a good representative turnout is most urgently needed. The meeting is planned for Wednesday, October 5th at 2:30 p.m.

There are a number of suitable locations on the U of T for Dr. Parrott to hold such a Public Meeting and we hope he chooses to supplement the Seneca College meeting with one at the U of T.

Difficult or not, make it your business to attend. Further details will be forthcoming.

Sex-Ed Centre Offers Unbiased Information

The SAC-funded University of Toronto Sexual Education Centre is open to anyone — men or women — who show an interest or are in need of the factual and unbiased information that the Centre provides. Located at 44 St. George Street on the downtown campus, the Centre is a needed and welcome service that started operating in March of last year.

Molly Yeomans, the Centre's Co-Ordinator hopes that people will avail themselves of the Centre's services as she is sure that they will find the peer counselling there to be most helpful.

The Sex-Ed Centre is most anxious to hear your views. The people there look forward to having a greater involvement in campus life and need your active support. For more information about the Centre, a personal visit is your best bet for finding out about the wealth of resources available to you.

The Sex-Ed Centre tries to be a unique experience of mutual understanding. No one scowls at you and it's a good place to stop into if just to get something off your shoulders. Give the people there a call at 978-3977; and while you're doing that, make a note to change the incorrect phone listing for the Centre as given in this year's SAC Pocket Phone Directory. Sorry about that.

1978 U of T Review gets off the ground

By GEORGE COOK

The University of Toronto Review, a campus-wide collection of students' creative writing christened last year at a seque-party in Hart House, has again set sail in search of hitherto undiscovered literary loot.

Philip Brown, this year's editor, is hoping for a rich haul. "In the first year of operation people just didn't know about the Review," Brown said, "and for that reason it didn't get as wide a range of submissions as we hope to get this year."

Brown is confident that when the January 7th deadline for submissions arrives the Review will sail into port with more high quality stories, poems, plays and photographs than last year's editors had to work with.

After that the task of separating the gold from the tin begins.

"We'll judge submissions on the basis of style and content — on how well the story or poem comes across," Brown said.

Each of the five editors will read all the submissions and choose, in consultation, those they believe to have the greatest merit.

"If possible we'd like to sit down with people and talk to them about their work," Brown said. Through serious editorial criticism Brown hopes the best material can be further refined before publication.

"The purpose to the Review is to encourage people to read material written by students," Brown said. With a planned run of 10,000 copies it is certain the Review will get wide distribution on campus.

Asked whether the college reviews give sufficient exposure to poetry, Brown said: "I think some of the college reviews handle poetry well. But their distribution isn't campus-wide," he added. Our appeal is to all the colleges and campuses of the university."

The job of editing the material falls to Brown and four other Review editors — Rose Eng, Cary Fagan, Chris Joakim and Ann Walmsley. They will be aided by several old hands, among them Dave Folkes and Jill Shefrin from last year's Review.

Brown is still in search of editors from Erindale and Scarborough Colleges.

An advisory board of three people — Claude Bissell, Anne Montagnes and Frank Watt — will provide the necessary continuity and encouragement to get the Review safely into the hands of its readers.

Money for the Review will come from the Students Administrative Council (SAC), college councils, student organizations and off-campus sources. Last year's Review received funds from the Atkinson Charitable Foundation. They have again been approached for support, according to Brown, but have declined. "They give money on a one-shot basis only," he said.

The Review staff has opted to continue last year's format — a magazine style they believe is conducive to prospective readers' interest. It will appear in mid-

March, 1978. The estimated cost is $5,600, a good $4,700 of which will go to The Coach House Press for typesetting and printing.

According to its 1978 prospectus, the Review hopes to provide "a centre of continuity for writing at the University of Toronto."

If the crew of the U of T Review succeeds in wrestling buried treasure from the minds of students they will, Brown claims, have accomplished their prime aim — "to encourage creative writing on a campus-wide basis."

Know your rights: know the law

By RHONDA TEPPER

Legal rights and issues concerning students were topics at a Survival Workshop symposium in Sidney Smith Lounge last Friday.

With counselling of law student David Chong, the group of five engaged in an informal discussion concerning the politics of students' administration, police power, and criminal courts.

Ignorance may lead to the violation of certain rules, Chong said, and knowing where to turn in case of trouble is a compulsory aspect of university life. When a student feels he has been wronged somehow in his registration or grading, the first thing he should do is present his registrar with a petition on his "case", according to Chong. The petition is examined by a committee of the faculty to which the problem is related. If his appeal is refused, related Chong, the student may present his case to the Committee of Academic Affairs of the Governing Council.

In due time, the student will receive a written decision said Chong.

With the occurrence of crime in certain neighborhoods, more policemen are knocking on doors demanding a search of private dwellings. The public should be aware of their rights in such circumstances, Chong stated. A police officer need not be allowed entrance without a proper search warrant. Unless this document is displayed, the officer can be refused entrance. However, Chong did advise to allow the officer entrance, even if they know they're innocent, to avoid an arrest for uncooperation with the law.

If one is stopped on the street by a policeman and asked his name, address and destination, Chong said, the wisest approach is to answer as calmly as possible.

The only reason one should ever be persuaded into a police car to be taken to a station for further questioning, is if the officer announces that one is under arrest, instructed Chong. The subject can request the charge of the arrest, and is entitled to several phone calls requesting legal counsel.

Canada has fairly tolerant drug laws compared with many European countries, said Chong. The average sentence for drug trafficking violation is seven years in prison. One may have to face either conviction or a fine when arrested for drug possession, but if an absolute discharge is received, there is no criminal record.

The criminal court matters covered were familiar to most participants — Chong stated a defendant is innocent until proven guilty and that a defendant should not reject a lie-detector test if he knows he is innocent.

Grant plan favors unwed students

By KEN WHITEHURST

It will be cheaper to live in sin than to be married for students seeking grants from the new Ontario Study Grant Plan (OSGP), according to a document giving background information about the new plan, provided by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

The spouse of a married student must contribute toward the husband's or wife's educational costs. Even students who are married and registered as full-time students will be expected to contribute to each other's educational costs.

In practice, this means that if both married students are studying full-time, then the amount they must contribute from their summer or part-time earnings will be higher than the amount single students must contribute.

The ministry document also says that students who are presently receiving provincial grants but who would be ineligible for OSGP may be able to get grants anyway during a transition period between the old and new programs.

The cost of providing daycare for the children of students who are single parents will be considered when assessing those students' need for grant assistance.

Academic awards given in recognition of academic excellence will be considered a resource available for a student's educational costs when determining his need for a provincial grant. However, the ministry document says, "in recognition of academic excellence, a waiver of $700 is allowed against such awards for those seeking grant assistance."

Students applying for provincial assistance will be expected to report summer earnings, part-time earnings income from investments, income from alimony and other government programs and to provide information of the gross and net value of their assets.

In a separate statement, Carole Vaughan, Executive Assistant to Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott, said that the public appeals board, which is to be a part of the new grant plan, will not be ready for the first year of the program. There had been some hope that the appeals board would be ready at the start of the program.

Adult students: No-one cares

By MARIO CUTAJAR

One of the problems that an adult student at U of T might face is proving that he or she is married. Some students may have lost their marriage certificates before they got here.

This was one of a number of problems discussed at a meeting of the newly formed Undergraduate Full-Time Adult Students' group (UFAS) held last Friday at the Newman Centre. UFAS is composed primarily of adults returning to full time studies. John Kirkness, Vice-Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Educational Development, led the examination of the question, "Is the University structured for Adult Students?"

Kirkness opened the discussion with a reference to a monograph written by a returning student, a mother, appropriately entitled "Does anybody care?"

These questions brought a very strong response from the 20 or so adults at the discussion.

One woman related how a counsellor at Woodworth College told her she would have to sell her belongings, leave her apartment and move into a single room if she wanted to come to university. "You won't be eligible for OSAP," she was told by the counsellor, "so don't try to get it." This news wasn't unexpected for her but she felt that the same attitude on the counsellor's part could easily discourage a returning student from even applying to U of T.

Evaluation is another problem returning students have to deal with. UFAS president Larry Hawn brought up a case of an architecture student who applied to U of T after having worked with architecture firms for 15 years. He was told to take 100 level courses for his first year which he agreed to do on condition that consideration would be given to his skipping second year. He did very well in first year but when he suggested that he forego second year he was informed this was impossible.

The general feeling at the meeting was best expressed by student Ed Alexander who said that one of the things that astounded him on his return was that the university, quite apart from being an educational institution, turned out to be a "big game". The university, he said, should at least teach adult students the ins and outs of the game. UFAS, said Alexander, helps returning students cope with such problems.

U of T's Handicapped Students

By Mark Lukasiewicz

They are but a handful of U of T's 48,000 students, and though their numbers are small their problems are not.

These are U of T's physically handicapped; those blind, deaf, and otherwise disabled students who have the determination to attend a university among Ontario's worst in terms of facilities for the handicapped.

Morgue Elevators and Tunnels

The most obvious problem for these students, especially for those in wheelchairs, is physical accessibility. A study prepared in 1975 shows that fully one-half of U of T's buildings are inaccessible to students in wheelchairs. Another thirty percent are accessible only to students with assistance, in the form of another person to push or lift the wheelchair.

Only twenty percent of U of T's buildings are considered accessible to wheelchairs independent of assistance, and even these can be questioned.

Here, for example, is a description of access to the Banting Institute, listed as independently "accessible" in the 1975 study.

"Accessible — through the Toronto General Hospital tunnel. The tunnel can be reached from the hospital's Gerrard Street entrance, and it leads to the sub-basement level of the Institute. Here there is an elevator which services all floors.

"Accessible with assistance — through the rear morgue elevator reached from the parking lot. As there is no outside call button, assistance is needed to bring the elevator to the ground level."

Lengthy detours, service tunnels, and morgue elevators are but a few of the many inconveniences and indignities which handicapped students must expect at U of T.

Most of U of T's "accessible buildings" are on the newer Scarborough and Erindale campuses.

Recently revised building codes made facilities for the handicapped mandatory in these buildings.

But U of T's downtown campus, in the words of Mrs. Lois Reimer of Student Services, is "almost impossible" for handicapped students. Older structures such as University College, Hart House, and Trinity College are beyond repair in this respect.

Even newer buildings are inaccessible. Ramsay Wright and Sidney Smith, two of the most recently-built structures on campus, are accessible to wheelchairs only from a steep driveway to the basement level. Students wishing to enter either building would need assistance to negotiate the slope, and in winter ice and snow make the descent even more difficult. Once inside each building, students in wheelchairs can move about freely on their own, although in Ramsey Wright wheelchairs must be carried up steps into each large lecture room.

Robarts Library, another "accessible" building, can be entered only from the north. After ascending a long, winding ramp (lacking handrails) a student must ring a bell summoning library staff to open the fire exit — the regular entrance is a revolving door. Another ramp inside the building leads the student into the main foyer, where again he must summon assistance to use the staff elevator into the book stacks (other elevators are available only from the fourth floor).

Attitudes

Physical accessibility is not the only problem of handicapped students. "Attitude: that's the problem," says Anne Musgrave, a graduate student at U of T. (See box this page.) "People think of a handicap as an illness; an infirmity. . . they can't understand that except for the chair, or the cane, a handicapped person is just like

Walking across campus has become less of a problem for Anne Musgrave since she got her everyone else — two colds a year and all."

John Rae, chairperson of BOOST (Blind Organization of Ontario with Self-Help Tactics) agrees. "Public attitude is very definitely one of our greatest problems. It's a paradox; we can lobby and get legislative change, but it's much harder to change peoples' attitudes. And yet if we could change those attitudes, we wouldn't need that legislation . . .

everything would fall into place."

Rae believes that the problem of public attitudes begins in the school system, where from an early age handicapped children are segregated from their able-bodied peers. Until recently, Ontario's blind children were required to attend a residence school for the blind in Brantford.

Children with other physical handicaps are often placed in "special" classes, along with the slow learners and children requiring special attention, for which these classes were designed.

This segregation prevents able-bodied and handicapped children from talking, playing, and learning together, at precisely the age "when it's easier for healthier attitudes to develop," according to Rae.

Physical separation is not confined to the schools. Public transit is U of T Graduate student's handicap not a barrier

By MARK LUKASIEWICZ

Anne Musgrave, age twenty-five, is working towards a Master of Social Work at U of T. She is married and has a four year old daughter. She is also totally blind.

Although Anne has been blind since her childhood, she hasn't let her handicap get in the way of her life and career. She completed her BA in Psychology at Erindale College, and as she puts it, "I did all the things undergrads are famous for: partying too much, staying up too late and skipping the occasional lecture."

While attending Erindale Anne lived in a co-op house with other students. Taking notes on a brail slate and having texts read to her by volunteer readers were two ways she overcame the obvious difficulties of her handicap.

Anne recalls few problems in lectures and seminars. "It's a structured setting, and once you're seated, you're like everyone else . . . asking questions and making comments." She adds that professors are usually helpful in reading what is written on blackboards and speaking clearly.

Last June Anne acquired her dog guide Kate. Kate makes parking lots, long hallways, and auditoriums more accessible.

But Anne says that physical barriers, while they present severe difficulties for those in wheelchairs, are not so problematic for blind people. She notes that most U of T buildings are accessible to her, although some require an effort.

Anne is more concerned with attitude. "Handicapped people are handicapped; they're not sick. 'Some people tend to feel that a handicapped person must need help — not that you 'may' — but that you must. They're often surprised, and sometimes even hurt, when you say 'no' to an offer of help. Unfortunately, people just don't know what the handicapped people are capable of."

Anne doesn't mean to imply that the handicapped never need assistance. Asking directions from people on the street is one of her chief ways of getting around. But she and other handicapped people prefer to be asked before being propelled across an intersection by a "helpful" passerby.

Anne's degree in social work will lead her into a career in counselling. Her studies complement her work with BOOST (Blind Organization of Ontario with Self-Help Tactics) to give Anne a good knowledge of the problems of handicapped people.

Another of these problems is paternalism. "You wouldn't believe how much head-patting people in wheelchairs have to put up with."

Anne agrees that these and other problems faced by handicapped people are the result of "too little contact. People feel awkward and uncomfortable with a handicapped person. When you ask directions, they might say 'over there' without telling you where 'there' is."

Anne is pleased to see the recent moves towards decentralized education for the handicapped. She is hopeful that this increased contact between handicapped and able-bodied children will improve public awareness and attitudes towards handicapped people. But until these attitudes improve, Anne and other handicapped persons will have to put up with stories about "poor Aunt Zelle who couldn't see either", and with the occasional pat on the head.

Anne says what amazes some people about her is her attitude: the fact that she doesn't live every moment in hope of regaining her sight. Says Anne, "I've adjusted and I just carry on."

classrooms within normal public schools. This gives the children both the special education they need and the peer and family contact which they would otherwise lack.

Awareness of the problems of handicapped persons seems to be growing, largely through the efforts of organizations such as CUT, BOOST, and ALPHA, who have become increasingly vocal and articulate in lobbying for usable transit, equal opportunities in education and work and other rights.

U of T "impossible"

U of T's administration also seems to be waking up to the needs of handicapped people. Mrs. Lois Reimer, director of student services, admits that it is "an area that has been long-neglected."

Mrs. Reimer acknowledged that the St. George campus is "almost impossible" for handicapped students. She said that to her knowledge no significant steps had been taken to upgrade any of the inaccessible buildings listed in the 1975 report.

Mrs. Reimer added that renovations to existing buildings would be "extremely costly," and that she was exploring alternate sources of funding for such projects. Because of the expenses involved, she said, the university would have to decide which buildings would have priority in making the needed changes.

Mrs. Reimer said "I wish I knew" when asked why relatively new buildings such as Sidney Smith were not built with facilities for the handicapped. She speculated that, like other planned facilities in new buildings, facilities for the handicapped had suffered from budget restrictions.

Although Mrs. Reimer listed her office in the student services handbook as an enquiry and troubleshooting service, she admitted that her knowledge of the problems of the handicapped was limited. She said that so far she has only been able to refer handicapped students to accessible residences, accessible buildings, and suitable persons for arranging special examinations and tests.

York University, unlike U of T, is well-prepared to deal with the handicapped. According to Judy Snow, director of York's Centre for Special Services for Handicapped Students, the York campus is 98 percent accessible to students in wheelchairs.

The centre, which receives its office space and equipment from the university and funding from the Atkinson Charitable Foundation, serves twenty to twenty-five clients each year. The centre offers personal, career and academic counselling, and also helps students to arrange for special examinations, transportation, and relocation of classes to more accessible areas.

In addition to the physical suitability of the York campus, Ms. Snow believes that students and staff at the university have a better-than-average awareness of the handicapped. Because there are almost fifty handicapped persons among the ten thousand students at York, they are visible enough that staff and students become aware of their presence. This awareness precludes some of the attitudinal problems encountered by students elsewhere.

Ms. Snow said that U of T would be "difficult" at best for a handicapped student. She cited the large distances between buildings and the lack of curricula designed to take place in one or two buildings (as is done increasingly at York) as two factors working against any handicapped student at U of T. She said that U of T's suburban campuses were far more suitable for the handicapped.

The Varsity — Mark Lukaszewicz

Long staircases are but one example of physical barriers facing the handicapped.

Although the U of T is unnecessarily difficult for handicapped students, even the most extensive building renovations will not solve the problems of large distances and congested traffic. Nonetheless, efforts could be made to accommodate the handicapped in several central buildings, from which complete curricula in several degree programs could be offered. A handicapped student could, for example, take all courses needed for a degree in Economics, Political Science, or Commerce in the Sidney Smith Building. Unfortunately, the building is not practically accessible to students in wheelchairs.

As for attitudinal problems, these will take time to eliminate. The reintegration of the handicapped into schools and public places cannot help but improve public attitudes and eliminate prejudices and misconceptions.

So the next time you feel like helping that blind fellow across the street, ask first . . . and don't be offended if he tells you he's been crossing streets longer than you have.

The Varsity — Mark Lukaszewicz

Even curbs are a major obstacle for wheelchairs.

almost totally inaccessible to the handicapped; governments prefer to concentrate funding in special "wheeltrans" systems, designed exclusively to service the handicapped. David Graham, of CUT (Coalition for Usable Transportation), believes that if public transit were made more usable for the disabled, the "Wheeltrans" systems could be greatly reduced. Graham describes the vicious circle of negotiations and lobbying with the TTC, in which the Commission refuses to convert existing buses and streetcars because of expense, and in the same breath declines to include elevators in new subway stations saying that access transit (bus and streetcar) is inaccessible anyway.

The result of all of this, in a word, is ignorance: the public simply does not know how to act or what to say in the presence of handicapped people.

This ignorance gives rise to innumerable problems. Employers believe that a handicapped person will be less productive than his able-bodied counterparts. They believe, all statistics to the contrary, that a handicapped employee will be accident-prone and unreliable.

Physical disabilities become associated with mental disabilities, as if the two were somehow inseparable. Waitresses and clerks will avoid addressing a handicapped person directly, preferring to ask a companion "what is his name?" or "what would he like to drink?"

Overhelpful citizens become convinced that because a person is handicapped, he must need help. A blind person standing at an intersection may feel himself being taken by the arm and shoved forward, without a word of warning . . . usually by someone who didn't think to ask "May I help you?"

Already, education for the handicapped is being decentralized. Many blind children now attend the Brantford residence school for grades one to four returning to their neighbourhood schools to complete their education. A new experimental program in Toronto allows blind children a choice: the Brantford school entirely, or learning braille and other special skills in special

Pollution not forgotten

Group continues pollution probe

By MICHAEL KANTER

Whatever happened to the public concern over pollution of a few years ago? It's been hidden behind the overshadowing issue of the state of the economy, according to Pollution Probe, the U of T-based environmentalist group.

Although the attention of the public has shifted, Pollution Probe still lives, and despite the lower profile of this independent public interest group, it still remains concerned about pollution.

The problem of pollution is complex, according to Probe spokeswoman Linda Pim and Adele Hurley. The issue may connote only huge smoke stacks and filthy rivers to some, they say, but the activity of Pollution Probe extends further. It is concerned with "environmental problems" — anything from industry pollution to energy policy to art in the TTC subways.

Recently the energy issue has become public concern. From this new focus Energy Probe, a new division within Pollution Probe, has emerged as an increasingly important team.

Richard Fine, a member of Energy Probe, recently wrote a booklet on Alternative Energy Sources for Canada. Energy Probe, spearheaded by Fine's booklet, has criticized the government for not seriously studying renewable energy options. These options include solar heating, wind, and biomass (energy from wood or plants).

The group encourages the development of solar heating by suggesting such policies as low interest loans for buyers of solar homes. Energy Probe has advocated that Canada switch to a renewable economy immediately, before the amount presently being invested in nuclear plants, tar sands and oil exploration makes that action unlikely.

Pollution Probe originated in 1969 as a citizen's environmental group, based at the U of T. It is still funded by donations from individuals, corporations and the government. Pollution Probe was instrumental in the banning the use of D.D.T. It was also active in the campaigns against the use of phosphates and for more effective sewer systems. It criticized Ontario Hydro for advocating a high consumption of electricity.

The Pollution Probe office now maintains a full time staff of 14, divided into certain "teams." Operating decisions are made at weekly Tuesday meetings. There also exists an Advisory Board, made up of academics and professionals. The Board is headed by Professor Donald Chant, Provost of U of T, who edited a book entitled "Pollution Probe."

Currently, Pollution Probe is involved in land management, research for safer and more nutritious foods and "conserver" education. The conserver education program consists of such items as "Operation Boomerang", a weekly award publicly given to the company contributing most to harmful waste. Procter and Gamble were the recent recipients for their toothpaste box. Disposable razors are also on Pollution Probe's list of wasted energy and materials.

Will YOU be one of the thousands cut off OSAP Grants next year?

Last week, Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, announced major changes in OSAP (Ontario Student Assistance Plan).

The new stricter provisions will allow students to receive grant assistance for no more than 4 years. This effectively disqualifies all students enrolled in professional and graduate courses. OFS estimates that this will make 20% of students now receiving assistance no longer eligible for grants.

The Ministry has been extraordinarily vague about other aspects of the new program. How many more students will be cut off by as yet unannounced provisions?

Parrott will be holding a public meeting to get student reactions to the new proposal.

"It was like a minefield out there"

200 hours of tape reveal game drama

By TED STAUNTON

The arrest of five University of Western Ontario exiles on the U of T campus last night has uncovered the existence of a network of electronic bugging devices implanted in the playing field at Varsity Stadium.

The purpose of the bugs was apparently to eavesdrop on Blues players during games and practices. After questioning the suspects U of T police extracted taping equipment from beneath hash marks, inside hollowed-out goal posts, in the end zones, and from random places on the playing surface. "There were so many it was like a minefield out there," said one official. It was estimated the devices had been in place for several years.

The five suspects all claimed to be working for a person known only as Superfan, who told them that he had been too small to play college football, and thus had never had the chance to find out what it was really like on the field. To satisfy his curiosity, he paid the men an undisclosed sum to set up the covert bugging operation in the summer of 1976. Police are looking for a wealthy U of T alumnus wearing a raccoon coat and a blue football helmet. The man is armed with a pennant on a small stick, and considered dangerous.

The five Western exiles were arrested as they emerged from a manhole cover on Bloor Street, just outside the stadium. Police acted on an anonymous telephone tip. Those arrested had apparently been checking the condition of the equipment.

The men subsequently led police to safety deposit boxes filled with hundreds of hours of tapes made over the past two years.

The Varsity was able to obtain copies of approximately 200 hours of tape, 199 1-2 of which consisted solely of the sound of lawn mowers and conversations among members of the maintenance staff. Thus, most of the tapes are useless, although some of the conversations were pretty spicy.

The rest of the tapes consisted of exchanges between players during the games. They provide fascinating insights into the nature of the game and its players. Their value as documentation of collegiate football has prompted the Varsity to present edited transcripts of some of the recordings.

(Note: As none of the tapes are dated or catalogued it is impossible to determine when the conversations took place. The poor quality of the recording also makes it impossible to identify many of the voices. Thus the first person to speak on each

Students discuss goals

By HUBERT LUM

The New College Student Council (NCSC) University Night, held Monday at New College's Wetmore Hall, had all the trappings of a congenial and informative evening. Billed as an opportunity for students to talk informally with teachers concerning their immediate and distant academic goals, the evening lacked only two things: teachers and students.

With the absence of more than half the professors who had promised to attend, many of the tables of Wetmore Hall were empty. NCSC organizer Colin Swift shrugged his shoulders.

In response to the poor student turnout, Swift cited apathy.

Professor G. Hamel suggested the timing was unfortunate. Since the deadline for course changes and withdrawals had passed, students were no longer interested in discussing their program of study, he said. Conceding that the timing was bad, Swift explained the event had been scheduled for the previous Monday, but that the date had been revised to avoid a conflict with Student Administrative Council's (SAC) street dance on Willcocks.

Librarian Jeanne Guilleme sensed the return of a trend towards narrow-mindedness on the part of freshmen. She said the kind of dialogue offered by University Night was deemed extraneous by freshmen with "fixed, pragmatic aims."

The handful of students and professors who did attend the gathering tried earnestly to create a pleasant atmosphere. Guilleme for instance set up a mini-library on the spot. She plastered two bulletin boards with photographs and information. She covered tables with books, among them recent publications. Overlooking the display was a microcatalogue machine. After a brief session with Guilleme, two students solved the mystery of the device.

Plaque unveiled

By RANDY WINTER

The climax of Wycliffe College's centennial celebrations occurred Sunday, when a commemorative plaque was unveiled in a special service at St. James' Cathedral.

The plaque, which will hang in the west narthex of the cathedral, is meant to be more than just an historical reminder, according to principal Dr. Reginald Stackhouse. In a sermon comparing the uncertainty felt by the founders in 1877 with that of many people today, Stackhouse said that the plaque should serve "as a memorial to God's faithfulness."

The Prayer of Dedication was read by the Right Reverend Henry Marsh, a retired bishop of the Yukon and a graduate of the college. The choice of Marsh was fitting, said Stackhouse, as he represents the large number of graduates who have entered the ministry, many to become missionaries and bishops. In addition, Marsh's father was a member of the first graduating class, and his family spans Wycliffe's history.

Wycliffe College has been federated with the University of Toronto since 1889. The college, which began with nine students, is regarded as one of the world's great Anglican theological colleges. Wycliffe graduates include a Primate of Canada, a Primate of Britain and a Primate of Australia. The present Archbishop of Canterbury was a professor at Wycliffe.

New plaque in St. James' Cathedral at Wycliffe College will "serve as a memorial to God's faithfulness."

Canadian composer Murray Schafer.

Cage on McLuhan

By JACKIE LONDON

Canada has the world's greatest critic and one of the world's greatest music teachers, according to John Cage.

Cage, the composer whose work has shaped much of twentieth century music, said that in his opinion, the world's greatest critic is Marshall McLuhan and one of the world's greatest music teachers is Canadian composer Murray Schafer.

"Marshall McLuhan's attitude toward art, society and technology is that of a detective," he said. "Critics just say what is good and bad. These are value judgements and as such they can only rely on past judgements. They do not look into the future," he said. "McLuhan's work is illuminating as a guide to making discoveries."

Asked whether he knew of any great music teachers, Cage replied "Murray Schafer of Canada. He's written a beautiful book about the world around us. If a student studies music, he studies the work of others. In any music school, the creating student is in the minority. But creative musicians would be in the majority in Schafer's school."

Cage, who is 65 years old this year, has seen festivals of his music held throughout the world. U of T students and teachers have organized festivities to honor the composer every day this week. The celebrations will culminate on Saturday when Cage will give a lecture at The Music Gallery and hear a program of his music performed in the evening at the University's Edward Johnson Building.

Students spend summer in Siena

By JENNY GULLEN

About one hundred students, most of them from U of T, spent this past summer studying abroad, one group at the University of Strasbourg, France, and another at the University of Siena in Italy.

Most of the courses offered during the six-week programs were also available on the St. George campus through the Language and Literature departments of Woodsworth College. The Siena program also provided a number of courses for students in the Fine Arts field.

The courses were taught by both U of T and foreign professors and were open to all U of T students as well as others possessing a letter of permission from the Admissions office. All courses in the Language and Literature departments (except for one Italian language and literature course for beginners), were taught in the language of the host country. The Fine Arts courses, however, were given in English.

U of T student Beate Ziegert, who had spent the six weeks in Siena, was very enthusiastic about the program. As a Fine Arts student, she highly recommends it as a means of gaining a true appreciation of the culture of a country. "You are able to see the art in terms of the economic, social and cultural environment of the country, even in the context of the buildings, the streets and the people. You just can't compare that to looking at slides in a classroom," she said.

All the students, especially those in the Fine Arts program, participated in field trips as a part of their courses or just to see other parts of the country. The Fine Arts students visited Florence to see the monuments and sculptures, and travelled to Assisi, famous for its ancient frescoes. In France, the students had the opportunity to do some wine-tasting in the Vosges Mountain region and to visit numerous museums and cathedrals in the area.

Classes were held on weekday mornings only, and the afternoons and weekends were free for organized trips, or to explore the immediate town, do research work, or travel on one's own. Many took this opportunity to travel from Siena to such places as Rome, Padua and Pisa and from Strasbourg to Paris, Arles and even to neighbouring Germany. The students in Siena, a walled city still possessing a medieval quality, were able to speak with townspeople in the coffeshops of the El Campo (the main square) thus gaining an excellent opportunity to practise their language skills.

The students of the Italian program were also able to view the Palio, an event which attracts visitors to Siena from all over the world. Originating in the Middle Ages, the Palio consists of several large and colourful church processions, all in medieval costume, followed by the traditional horserace and great festivities. In Strasbourg, the many different foods of the Alsatian region and the spectacular organ concerts in the cathedrals were just two of the many attractions which helped students to savor the culture of the area.

Political prisoners need protection

By ARLENE SHAVER

"The protection of the human rights of political prisoners" was one of the topics of a meeting held by the Toronto Group 18 of Amnesty International (AI). Amnesty International, an organization describing itself as a "worldwide human rights movement" works for the release of "prisoners of conscience" provided they have neither used nor advocated the use of violence.

About 70 people attended the meeting, chaired by John Meyers, at which the "adopt-a-prisoner" program was discussed. Toronto Group 18, under the supervision of Janet Comfort, adopted a 64 year old Uruguayan man arrested in October 1973. He was subjected to beatings, lack of medical attention and inadequate diet. His family is convinced, she said, that pressure from Amnesty International led to the improvement of his prison conditions.

Members discussed the "country action" campaign in the planning stage under the International Secretariat of Amnesty International based in London, England. This campaign will focus on the human rights of people in Ethiopia.

In 1972 AI launched a campaign for the abolition of torture (CAT) with co-ordinator Margaret Cooper. A research department documents evidence of countries where torture is used. In many places torture has become an intricate science with its own research facilities, it was stated. Cooper said that CAT publishes its reports in an effort to increase public awareness and mobilize campaigns to rescue the victims of torture.

Amnesty International's involvement in the campaign for the abolition of capital punishment also came under discussion. Meeting participants affirmed the hope of setting up a central Toronto office with the view of its becoming the focal point for human rights group in the Toronto area.

Orchestra swamps Beethoven

By ARTHUR KAPTAINIS

Although Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO) Music Director Andrew Davis has a reputation abroad mainly as an interpreter of English and Russian masters, he has been careful to schedule plenty of standard German numbers during his first few years in Toronto. Last week at Massey Hall, Davis made his first podium appearances of the season with a program including Beethoven's Fourth and Fifth Symphonies. Saturday's concert to me represented no advance in his understanding of the master.

Davis is faithful to Beethoven's intentions insofar as he doesn't tamper with orchestration or ignore repeat signs, but otherwise has little claim to authoritative execution. My principal complaint is the great whale of an orchestra he assembled to perform these lean and sinewy works. The seven basses were especially onerous.

I suppose the oversized orchestra was the beginning of almost all Davis' problems, because it deprived him of so many interpretive tools. Balance fluctuated randomly, inner voices were lost, and phrasing was pointless. The ensemble size was likely also responsible for Davis' consistent choice of slow tempos. The result was neither simple nor subtle: just a 16-ton semi-lumbering along in low.

The supposedly neglected Beethoven Fourth Symphony is free, sunny, and vigorous. Davis' account failed to supply the fleet and lightweight playing that gives this symphony vitality. The slow introduction, while similar to that of the well-played third "Leonora" overture, was played inaccurately and without character.

The adagio second movement is easier than the first, and not surprisingly was better played. But Davis' tempo was sluggish and the beat was often lost. The Menuetto, however, was one of the evening's best performances; aggressive and accurate, with good woodwinds and strong clean horns.

Davis' way with the opening motive of the fifth was powerful and full of promise; promise unfulfilled by his brusque and headlong reading of the first movement. It wasn't particularly fast, just rhythmically brutal. There was little attention to detail, nothing to satisfy the analytic mind.

Another slow and undistinguished Andante followed — its most interesting feature was a set of overloud tympani. The Scherzo was adequate. Davis played the opening three chords of the Finale much more broadly than the rest of the movement; a corny old device never used to good effect. Otherwise the Finale was played with enough outgoing vigor to be effective.

Men Stay Afloat Record Upset Over Western

By BRENDAN MULROY

University of Toronto oarsmen were poor hosts at their regatta, held along the lakeshore on Saturday, September 24. Toronto crews showed little concern for their guests by rowing to two firsts and three second place finishes. In doing so, U of T captured the men's division total point championship.

This victory marked the first time Western has been upset for a points championship in five years. Commented former Western oarsman Stu McKen, "three years ago we only had to worry about Brock. In that period of time U of T has come out of the blue (a poor pun Stewart) to establish itself as the second best rowing school in Ontario."

A strong wind blowing directly down the course pushed crews to fast times throughout the day. It also necessitated several rescue operations. A two boat collision cracked an Erindale eight completely in half. Members of the crew vainly tried to row ashore as the water rose to their armpits. Meanwhile, a rescue boat had picked up the Erindale bowman, who was spotted floating forlornly down the course in his sheared off section of the shell.

Another mishap occurred when a Trent women's eight capsized near the starting line. In this instance, however, the boat sank in only two feet of water and was quickly upright.

Two more accidents occurred at the other end of the course. Two consecutive crews from McMaster were blown off course and crashed into sailboats moored near the finish line. Several riggers were damaged but the boats remained upright. So much for the sideshow at the regatta.

Toronto's first victory came in the men's novice division. The Toronto phys ed crew, coached by Peter Klavara, was far superior to their rivals. Stroke Tom Sheppard brought his crew down through the rough water in a time 26 seconds faster than second place Trent.

U of T's second victory was recorded by the lightweight Varsity crew. The lightweight displayed a gambling and aggressive style in their win. Cox, Maurice De Wolf sent the crew off at a higher stroke rate than any other crew was willing to risk in the dangerous chop. The gamble appeared to be paying off as the crew ate up the distance between themselves and Western.

However, a crab caught simultaneously by all of portside, left the boat sitting nearly perpendicular to the course. Said De Wolf, "At that point I thought we were finished. Usually a bad crab like that completely demoralizes a crew, but they just straightened the boat out, started pulling like horses, and all of a sudden we were backed up with Western." The lightweight crew's winning time was seven seconds faster than Western's and stood as the fastest time of the day.

The second place finishes came in the exhibition fours, men's J. V., and men's heavy Varsity. Coach French termed the second place finish in the four "a pleasant surprise, seeing as they had never rowed together before." "It's obvious", French added, "that they can only get better."

The men's J. V. crew suffered a heartbreaking defeat, losing to Western by a mere one second. Strokeman Bob Boraks took the loss philosophically "One second isn't much," he noted "and besides, I like rowing as the underdog."

The heavy crew had all day to think about their race, and to observe a Guelph crew which boasted four members from the Canadian Olympic Team. Admitted cox Larry Marshall, "I was awed by the Guelph crew. By the time the race came I was spending more time watching them than my crew."

Despite his awe, Marshall managed to exhort his crew to a time only 17 seconds behind Guelph. All crew members agreed it will be a different story next week. Four oar, Charlie Bartlett summed up the crew's feelings best when he observed, "Guelph oarsmen would have peaked in their conditioning at the world rowing championships in August. They're in a decline now, whereas we are getting better every day."

Team spirits rose even higher when it was learned that the crew would be bolstered by the return of Nat Finley, just returned from a summer of rowing in West Germany, and national team member Tim Turner.

All crews now turn their eyes toward the gruelling 2.8 mile Head of the Trent race. Remarks lightweight coach Tony Hyland, "some of them have never gone that distance before. Some of them don't know the pain it will involve. But I just keep telling them they'll love it."

Phys Ed Where Are You?

By JANICE KELSEY

The 1977 interfaculty football season opened last week without, what has been in the past, one of its strongest teams.

For the first time since the late 1950's, Phys. Ed. has not fielded a team. Contrary to the belief of rival teams, fear of failure is not the sole reason for withdrawal. Last year's dismal results were only an indication of some basic problems.

The biggest problem, for every interfaculty sport is to find enough people willing to organize and participate. This becomes especially difficult in Phys. Ed. because many potential players are members of intercollegiate teams and are away at camp when football is organized.

These however are only excuses. Recreation Coordinator Dave Copp says there has been a sad lack of interest among Phys. Ed. students recently. Copp pointed out that last year's team was mismanaged due to a lack of leadership. There were no tryouts or practices.

Only sixteen players signed up this year, not enough for a full team. Of these, the most interested are now playing for other colleges. But with four hundred men available it seems odd that the problem has arisen.

Next years Phys. Ed. hopes to see a bigger, better than ever team, ready to win.

Depth In Defensive Line Is Blues Forte

By JIM O'LEARY

Over the year fearsome defensive lines have become synonymous with great football teams. In the 1960's Los Angeles had the "Fearsome Foursome" and Minnesota had the "Purple Gang". In the 1970's Pittsburgh boasts one of the toughest defensive lines of all time in the "Steel Curtain".

In keeping with this tradition, the University of Toronto Blues have fielded an awesome defensive line in 1977. Rated by some as the biggest and most aggressive college line in the country, the "Criminal Element" (as they liked to be known) has been leading Toronto to victory this season.

Unlike other teams which rely on only four linemen to carry the brunt of the work, the Blues have six first string linemen who switch in and out of the lineup depending on the situation. The depth in linemen allows Ron Murphy to send in certain linemen in a rushing situation and others if a pass seems imminent.

According to Murphy this system is used because some players are better at certain aspects of the game than at others. By alternating players Murphy is assured of having the strongest men on the field for each situation.

The players do not object to the constant changing because as Murphy says "everyone gets to play."

The defensive line had their finest game of the season in Hamilton on Saturday. On a rain-soaked field they held McMaster to only 59 yards rushing. They also put considerable pressure on the Marauder quarterbacks throughout the game and must be given part of the credit for allowing Harrison and Stubbart to complete only two of 17 passes.

Detractors will point to the fact that the success of the defensive line was in large part due to the rotten field conditions. The mud made it difficult for the runners to execute their cuts.

While it is true that the mud made it more difficult it must be remembered that the Blues managed to grind out 189 yards along the same field. And as defensive end Dave Yarmoluk points out, the slick conditions made it hard for the linemen to cover the wide stuff.

The six men who grind it out in the pit are: Eric Boss (6-2, 250 lbs), Bill Burkhart (6-3, 225 lbs), Angelo Castellan (6-3, 265 lbs), Bill Levine (6-6, 250 lbs), Dave Yarmoluk (6-3, 225 lbs), Ray Zarembo (6-3, 220 lbs). Yarmoluk and Burkhart are the ends while the other four alternate in the tackle positions.

The players are unanimous in their optimistic outlook for the remainder of the season. "This year's team is more jelled," claims Zarembo. When pressed for an explanation the other members of the line explained that this year's team is more together than last year. The players feel that there are less stars and therefore more unanimity on the team. This has produced a good atmosphere on the club with the players "more at ease."

The assessment that there are less stars on this year's team may not be correct. In actual fact there are probably more stars this year. The difference between this and last season is that because there are more stars, the gap between the best and the rest of the players is much smaller.

The proof of this statement is there to be seen in the defensive line.

Budget Cuts KO Champion

By JIM O'LEARY

Restrictions in the 1977-78 Athletic budget have made it doubtful that Jason Lo will be able to defend the North American intercollegiate boxing title he won last year. In the 1976-77 season Lo became the first Canadian to ever win this title.

University of Toronto commitments to the Ontario University

Athletic Association (OUAA) have made it necessary to cut funds to programs not involved in the OUAA. This means that boxing, curling, judo, karate and the women's second basketball team will receive no money to compete in intercollegiate tournaments in 1977-78.

This news came as a real blow to Lo, who had hoped to defend his title this year. In only his second year of competitive boxing, Lo had scored major upsets in the United States by winning titles in the Eastern Collegiate Boxing Association and the National Collegiate Boxing Association flyweight division. This marked the first time that a Canadian had been able to walk off with top honours in a major American meet.

Not only was Lo a success in the ring, he was also a big hit with the fans and organizers of the tournaments. They appreciated his sportsmanship, dedication and the cleverness he showed in the ring. As his coach Tony Canzano put it "Jason was a real credit to the university in more ways than one."

Director of Athletics, "Bud" Fraser is sympathetic to the plight of Lo, but his hands are tied because of a shortage of funds. "There are commitments to the OUAA which we cannot get out of," Fraser said in explaining why there is not enough money for the boxing program.

While there will be no intercollegiate participation, Fraser is quick to point out that this does not mean the end of boxing at the university. The Athletic department is more than willing to provide the space and facilities to allow for the running of a boxing club.

Fraser also points out that just because there will be no funds forthcoming to allow Lo to go to tournaments "it does not preclude him from finding funds from outside." According to Fraser the swimming team is in the process of finding outside funding for some of their tournaments.

Excellence co-ordinator Dalt White echoes Fraser's views. He feels that by establishing a boxing club Lo would be able to use this organization to raise funds. White also believes that "it is possible that we could do something" at some time in the future if enough interest is shown.

Lo has not given up hope that the department of athletics can be swayed to change their minds. He is planning to write an appeal to the excellence committee and hopes that other would-be boxers will let their feelings be heard on this matter.

At this point it looks like Lo's battle will be uphill all the way.

The Varsity needs a Women's Sports Editor.

The successful applicant will be responsible for assigning and writing stories, editing and laying them out. Women's Sports has been allotted space in 55 issues. This means that whoever is chosen for editor will have a section in almost all the issues to be published in the current year.

Those interested should either come to The Varsity offices in person (between 12:00 pm and 5:00 pm) or apply in writing. Telephoned applications will not be accepted.

On Your Mark....Get Set....

South Africans get U of T advice

By ROBERTA CLARE

Two senior administrators from Stellenbosch University in South Africa will be coming to this university next Wednesday and Thursday, in the face of opposition from U of T faculty members, to attend meetings with administrative representatives from St. George, Erindale and Scarborough campuses.

The visit is one of many to multi-campus universities across Europe and North America being made by the president and the chief architect of Stellenbosch University. Their purpose is to seek technical aid and information regarding the establishment of a second campus at their university.

The U of T visit will include meetings with representatives from Erindale and Scarborough. On the St. George campus, meetings with Physical Plant personnel, Dean of Arts and Sciences Arthur Kruger and the Department of Research and Planning have been scheduled at Simcoe Hall.

Dissension has already arisen over the up-coming visit. Both the Dean and Chairman of Scarborough College have refused to attend any meetings with the Stellenbosch officials. On Monday the Scarborough College Council passed a resolution reading: "This council deplores the visit of senior officers of the University of Stellenbosch to the University of Toronto and to Scarborough College."

The resolution was passed by a large majority. Professor G. Israelstam, plant physiologist and member of the Scarborough College Council, commented: "By the act of being prepared to discuss the establishment of a satellite college we are accepting their right to discriminate. We are condoning their policy."

In spite of the stance taken by the Scarborough College Council Monday night, Dr. Joan Foley, President of Scarborough College, will be attending the meetings. Foley herself was unavailable for comment.

Located 30 miles north-east of Capetown, the University of Stellenbosch does not admit students of any other racial background but white. The Scarborough College Council disapproves of offering the Stellenbosch administrators advice or information on establishing a campus that would necessarily be racist. Professor Israelstam added: "We are not preventing freedom of speech. They are coming not to espouse their views but to seek advice."

Professor Harry Eastman, Vice-President of Research and Planning, is organizing the meetings between the U of T and Stellenbosch administrators. When asked to comment on the disapproval of the Scarborough College Council Monday night, Professor Eastman remarked: "Whenever there is a genuine academic purpose in an exchange of information between a foreign university and ourselves, it is our duty, as a university devoted to learning and research, to engage in a free exchange of knowledge."

As long as the interest of the Stellenbosch officials is genuine, he says, and they wish to discuss and benefit from the expertise of U of T administrative staff, U of T will encourage the exchange of information between the two universities.

Our $$$ aid racism?

By ANDREW MAHON

When officials from South Africa's Stellenbosch University arrive at U of T next week, there will be a new group on campus to meet them. The Committee to Stop Bank Loans to South Africa had their first meeting last Wednesday at the International Students Centre (ISC) and intend to make a visible protest against the presence of the visiting dignitaries.

"Two and a half million dollars of U of T investments are tied up in banks who have invested in South Africa," said Leo Casey, Vice-President of the Graduate Students Union (GSU) and instigator of the committee. He introduced the idea of the committee as a result of the university's attitude toward the apartheid situation in South Africa.

Last spring, U of T professors M. Klein of the Department of History and C. Pratt of Political Economy introduced a motion to the Governing Council Business Affairs Committee asking the university to censor four banks for their loans to the South African government. However the administration, according to Casey, "didn't have a minimal interest in taking a stand on this issue."

Casey maintained that U of T administration "must be presented with an idea of the sentiments of students of this campus."

Casey was also anxious to propose a date for general withdrawal of funds from banks. (The GSU itself withdrew its bank account from the Royal Bank and put it in a Credit Union.)

Students at the meeting agreed it was important to inform more students about apartheid. Thus, one of the main purposes of the committee would entail arranging films and forums where members could go and talk to students. As Casey observed, "It's important for U of T students to be aware of precisely what is happening in South Africa."

Graduate students lobby for greater benefits

By ALAN BASS

Higher salaries, a fringe benefits program and smaller tutorial groups are among the issues being negotiated in talks currently underway between the Graduate Assistants Association (GAA) and the university administration. A new system of job classification is also being discussed.

Under the old agreement, which expired August 31, teaching assistants and part-time lecturers are paid according to their level of certified education. Undergraduates are presently paid $2,358 for each course handled per academic session. M.A. and M.Sc. students receive $2,808. The rate of pay for PhD's is $3,229. These salaries are based on the assumption that Tutorial Assistants (TA's) devote a total of 270 hours of their time to each course.

Under new proposals put forward by the GAA, TA's would receive $4,100 per session and $5,000 would be paid to part-time lecturers who, according to GAA business agent Jean Greatbatch, carry a greater workload and more responsibility. Academic status would not be a factor in determining salary.

Another proposal would raise the paid working time for TA's to 330 hours per session. This figure includes provisions for time spent in pre-session preparation and essay evaluation over reading week and Christmas, for which TA's are not presently paid.

When asked if the new OSAP regulations, which will eliminate grants to graduate students, had affected the GAA proposals,

Greatbatch said that although the OSAP plan was unknown when the GAA stance was drawn up, it certainly "reinforces our position."

Also sought by the GAA is a fringe benefits plan which would include Blue Cross and dental coverage. Other proposals include placing limits on tutorial group sizes and the institution of compulsory payment of association dues by all TA's. Actual membership in the union would, however, remain voluntary.

At present negotiations appear to be proceeding at a regular if not furiously first pace. Administration negotiator John Parker, Manager of Labor Relations, described administration relations with the GAA as "amicable" and said that he hoped an agreement could be reached "as soon as possible."

Greatbatch is also optimistic that talks will not become protracted. She expects an agreement to be reached by late November.

SAC, OFS blitzing campaign whip up student opposition to Parrott's new grant program

By ANDREW MAHON

Preparations got underway yesterday at the student council (SAC) office for Harry Parrott's meeting with students at Seneca College. U of T residences and classes will be pamphleted, and bus service provided. Deputy External Commissioner Mark McElwain discussed with SAC officials and students Parrott's impending meeting next Wednesday, and the new student aid plan.

Chris Alnutt from the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) was on hand to outline some of the details of the new program which will come into effect in the 1978-79 school year. He pointed out the four year limit on grants which will allow students to receive assistance for only eight half year periods. He also emphasized that "the actual amount of money available for students is going down."

Alnutt said Parrott will be visiting five colleges around the province to obtain feedback for his new program, although his Toronto visit is limited to a stint at Seneca College this Wednesday at 2:30 pm. Alnutt also said he had heard one of the reasons the meeting was being held in such an inaccessible location was because there was "plenty of parking available."

McElwain outlined preparations for the meeting. Several buses to Seneca College will be leaving King's College Circle at 1:15 pm on Wednesday. In addition, pamphlets distributed to residences will tell students about the meeting and explaining various facets of the new aid program.

In the next few days, students will also be visiting classes on campus to encourage people to come to Seneca.

After the meeting, McElwain said that it was important for students to come to the Seneca meeting since "it is the only opportunity Parrott is giving students for input."

"It's really necessary for us to show how we feel," he maintained, and urged students to "miss a few classes in return for a decent student aid program."

Clever fellows, these engineers.

Bubbles & The Clowns

By LEON KING

An estimated 150 engineers struck at the main entrance to the Sidney Smith building Wednesday just before 1:00 p.m. Minutes later they were gone, leaving only a watery mess and eight plastic garbage pails as a reminder of their attack.

The engineers' trek moved north along St. George, stopped momentarily at the foot of Wilcocks to split into three groups. The largest attacked from the east, led by a man in a white lab coat. The second group attacked simultaneously from the west. From the balcony above the "Nad" (group three) played (?) on.

Minutes later they left, chanting and singing, by the south side doors.

Al Comb, U of T Physical Plant caretaker, said that no damage was done by the raiders, but indicated he was not exactly happy with the mess. However, it is the caretaking staff that cleans up after such pranks.

The engineers used a copious mixture of soap, water and dry ice in large plastic pails to produce the suds. As the dry ice sublimated, bubbles rose in the water-soap solution and overflowed onto the floor. Inundated were the east and west entrances and the western section of the lobby floor. The central part of the floor, including the rug and chairs, was unaffected.

This escapade was the latest in a rash of antics this September that have included hiring a stripper to pose as Lady Godiva, burgling the offices of the Varsity, and repainting the SAC dome its original white.

Deans oppose grant program

By KATHY CANTY

Several deans of the professional faculties at U of T have spoken against the modifications announced recently in the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSA) for 1978.

When announcing the OSAP revisions, Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott said he hoped the changes would "encourage a reduction in the length of time needed by students to qualify for some professional programs such as dentistry and law."

Dr. A. R. Ten Cate dean of the Faculty of Dentistry, interprets this statement not as an attempt to put "pressure on the faculty" to reduce entrance requirements, but an attempt to pressure students to apply to dentistry earlier. It takes four years to finish a program at the Faculty of Dentistry, and a student can apply for this program only after one full year of university. This means that a student would be ineligible for grant assistance for at least one year of a dentistry program.

Ten Cate said the changes in the OSAP program are a "discriminatory move against professional students because of the length of their programs. I couldn't support it."

Students entering the Faculty of Law will be in a similar situation. It takes three years to finish a law degree program, and before entering the faculty a student must have completed two years of undergraduate work. The Dean of the Faculty of Law, Martin L. Friedland, said the OSAP revisions appear to be "an unfortunate development, as they will surely discourage students from lower income families from entering law school."

Ralph Garber, Dean of the Faculty of Social Work, concurred. "It's an unfortunate tendency to cut back on resources for those who need it most." It will hit the poorer students hardest, he said. At present a student must already have a B.A. to enter the Social Work program at U of T. The OSAP revisions will not affect enrolment in his faculty, added Garber, because there are usually four or five applicants for every space in the program.

Before enrolling in the Faculty of Medicine, a student must have at least two years of post-secondary education. Sometimes they have as many as eight years of university before entering medical school, said R. B. Holmes, Dean of the Faculty of Medicine. The entrance requirements for medical school could not be reduced, he added, because the accrediting bodies of the Faculty would be opposed to it. Indeed Holmes felt "We should move towards higher degree students" when looking at entrance applications. The profession and the public would benefit by this move, he said.

Neither P. H. Painter, Dean of the School of Graduate Studies, nor F. S. G. Halpenny, Dean of the Faculty of Library Science would comment on the changes in OSAP. They have taken a wait-and-see stand as Parrott tours the campuses of Ontario to discuss these revisions.

He will speak at the Finch Campus of Seneca College October 5.

UTFA proposals

Hart House Members ?

The University of Toronto Faculty Association (UTFA), in an attempt to save the dying Faculty Club, has proposed an attractive package of university club membership for faculty.

The predicament of the Faculty Club, whose costs go up and membership down every year, was the subject of a "bull session" at an UTFA meeting last week. The association was concerned about the club's continued existence, and a number of informal proposals were put forth.

Compulsory membership in the Faculty Club located at 41 Wilcocks St., for faculty members was put forward. A second suggestion was to "lump in" Hart House membership as a fringe benefit. The concern over Faculty Club membership was strong because, as Professor Jim Daniels, past UTFA president said, the club would be "an acute problem by Christmas time."

From this meeting a proposing group headed by Carman Guild, Assistant Warden of Hart House, has drawn up a formal proposal to the administration. The group included "unofficial spokesmen" for the Department of Athletics and Recreation (Athletic Complex), the Faculty Club and Hart House.

Using as their platform the desirability of faculty members "taking a fuller part" in the "life on campus," the group is suggesting the administration pay for tripartite club membership for faculty out of their own budget.

UTFA felt it was "up to the administration not to let the Faculty Club go under." The problem is now in their lap, he said.

The proposal puts the price for the combined memberships at $85, using Hart House and athletics fees paid by full time students as determining criteria. The justification for the Athletic Complex membership that the use of the facilities by teaching staff "will make an even more important contribution to the life of the University."

Implementation of the proposals is suggested for May 1st, 1978 by the group. Daniels pointed out, however, that the package "is going to cost something," and that the administration may offset the cost by not giving a salary increase.

"If the increase is less than what the Anti-Inflation Board guidelines set forth, then people may have second thoughts," said Daniels.

The matter will be coming up at one of the joint administration-faculty meetings held every month under the terms of the new UTFA contract.

The Faculty Club is foundering, said Daniels, because it's a private club and no longer has the campus monopoly on food and alcoholic beverage it held when it was founded in the late fifties. The membership currently hovers at 600, about one fourth the total faculty number.

Parrott, Morin elected to CME

By RICK BOGACZ

Jacques-Yvan Morin, Vice-Premier and Minister of Education of Quebec, and Harry Parrott, Ontario's Ministry of Colleges and Universities were elected to the new executive of the Council of Ministers of Education last week in Edmonton. Morin was chosen council chairman and Parrott vice-chairman.

The Council also decided to follow up a review of Secretary of State John Roberts' commitment to the present amendments to the Canadian Student Loans Act (CSLA) for the school year 1978-79. A review will also be carried out on the existence of minority language education throughout the provinces, it was decided.

The council's policy is to increase cooperation between the provinces regarding educational matters. The council members agreed in principle therefore, to produce an interprovincial exchange of printed learning materials. These currently remain the sole property of the provincial departments or education ministries. The exchange in itself will help broaden the range of available learning material, it was concluded.

The council agreed to meet with Roberts and negotiate for the renewal of the agreement between federal and provincial governments for bilingualism in education programs. The present agreement will expire in March 1979.

The council reviewed its own commitment last September to develop more effective relations with Canadian education organizations, and the agreement to increase the provinces' participation in international education conferences.

New regional representatives elected to council are British Columbia Minister of Education Patrick McGeer, Saskatchewan Minister of Education and Continuing Education Donald Faris and Nova Scotia Minister of Education George Mitchell.

The next meeting of the Council will be held in British Columbia in January 1978.

New reps for UC

By MOIRA DUDLEY

Election fever was in the air again as the University College Literary and Athletic Society held its annual

Library closures attacked

The Students' Administrative Council (SAC) will be protesting the possible closure of the campus libraries, it was decided at a Board of Directors' meeting Wednesday night.

A letter was sent yesterday to U of T president John Evans in opposition to the restricted hours proposed by the University Advisory Committee on the Library System at Monday's meeting.

The concern over the restricted hours is compounded by the increased number of students in classrooms, according to SAC president John Tuzyk.

Ontario Federation of Students researcher Chris Alnutt also attended the meeting to aid in the strategy drawn up for the new Ontario Students' Grant Plan. SAC has opposed the plan on the grounds that "it would further restrict accessibility to higher education."

Alnutt pointed out that "more and more details are emerging every day" from "informal conversations with Ministry officials" that show up the disadvantages of the plan. He specified the plan will be the prime item at this week-end's annual fall OFS conference being hosted by U of balloting Tuesday. Three first year representatives were chosen and the vacancies created by the departure of three previously elected third year reps were filled.

The UC Lit Society consists of a 24 member council which represents the interests of UC students. It is financially supported by compulsory non-academic fees and acts as the UC student governing body. It has "many diversified activities," including college sports, social events, and the UC student newspaper the Gargoyle.

This fall there were only three nominations for first year positions. Fred Myers, Gary Yee and Leon Sett were therefore acclaimed. Six students vied for the three vacant third year positions in a very close race that nevertheless saw little campaigning. UC Lit President Chris Brown maintained that this inactivity on the part of the candidates was not unusual in a by-election at the year-representative level.

Ten per cent of the eligible voters were "politically motivated enough" to cast their ballots. This, according to Brown, "is 100 per cent normal" for U of T elections. In all, 50 third-year students voted for those who would represent their interests. From the six candidates for the third-year positions, Doris Glavanov, John Raftery and Debbie Warren were elected. In spite of the disappointing turnout, Brown appeared satisfied with what he called "a remarkably smooth election." Brown said he felt they were competent and would do a good job.

Faculty members want memberships in three campus clubs so they can take "a fuller part in the life on campus." What life?

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

LET THEM EAT LOANS....

Steel magnate Andrew Carnegie, besides being a man of extraordinary wealth, was also the author of little-known tracts on the joys of being poor.

The time has gone when such outright hypocrisy was considered pious and exemplary but the attitude it typified remains. Today as before it is considered by some "vulgar" to demand a reasonable opportunity in life and the height of achievement to rob others of it. Let's be vulgar and consider the implications of Parrott's recent decrees on student aid:

In 1961 only 20 percent of the students at Ontario's universities came from families on the bottom half of the income scale. By 1976 that figure had inched up to 27 percent. If Parrott's latest revision of student aid is put into effect that figure will plummet again. It took 15 years to improve accessibility by a mere 7 percent. It might take 3 to 4 years to decrease it to the 1961 level.

Parrott's rationale is: "We must conserve public funds by encouraging students to complete their studies quickly." "Encouragement" as Parrott understands it does not mean a job at the end of four years. It means rather that if you don't complete university in four years the government will cut you out from the grant portion of student aid. It's what in behaviourist terminology is called "negative reinforcement": you either finish university in four years or you get a shock.

There are those who are able to see in Parrott's new plan a strong sense of civic responsibility, an attempt by the minister to stop spoiling a generation of spoiled students. Only the greedy, according to this view, could find Parrott's plan unacceptable. This view, ironically enough, is likely to be held by the same people who justified this year's increase in tuition fees on the grounds that OSAP would take care of those who could not afford it.

The real greed lies with those privileged enough to be complacent about the ever-decreasing chances of low income youth to make it to university. This is the real issue. Not whether the richer students can do without OSAP but whether Ontario universities are to be restricted to the rich.

It would certainly seem the professional faculties that have traditionally been the preserves of the rich, will become even more exclusive. If previously low income students found it hard to stay away from the work force for eight years they will find it even harder to do so in the future.

Those who can afford lengthy educations reply that those who want education badly enough can get it, that making education costly will ensure that only the most determined of students will reach university. This reminds us of the old notion that poverty is a prerequisite to artistic creation, a romantic myth previously held by those obviously too rich to be more creative in their fantasies.

As if these objections weren't enough Parrott's proposals also contradict his own government's recently adopted policy to fund universities according to quality. How can one talk about quality and at the same time "encourage" students to finish their studies in four years? Where is the quality of an education that requires one to be dependent on one's parents well into your twenties?

Far from advising students to give up their "materialism" we suggest they take it more seriously than ever. In a world where education costs money it is only the privileged who can afford to look down on the cost.

Shutterbugs

During the beautiful and moving chamber music concert by the Trio Mexico (Monday, Sept. 19 in Hart House), an overenthusiastic photographer decided to transform the trio into a quartet. Throughout the entire performance the photographer added his own improvised sounds to the music. He shuffled adroitly on a squeaky floor behind, in front of and through the audience, incessantly clicking camera shots, of the musicians and the audience, from every conceivable angle.

In the intimate atmosphere of the East Common Room repetitions and distinct noises are difficult to ignore even for the most devoted audience. A few discreet pictures would have sufficed instead of the zealous click, flash, squeak and shuffle routine which disturbed the audience's concentration and enjoyment, and showed little respect for the musicians.

Perhaps the photographer (whoever he was) didn't realize that a chamber music concert is not a football game — each movement of a cellist's arm does not need to be captured for instant replay.

Book mark up

A bookseller's lot is not a happy one.

If Ingrid Knutson were to examine the stock at the Textbook Store, she would find many examples of the sort of problem encountered with the first year Economics Workbook. Our pricing of texts is not haphazard; the prices on the books, with very few exceptions, are the prices that appear on our supplier's invoice and the difference between that price and our cost is usually 20 percent.

Some of our problems begin when the publisher increases the selling price. In a great many instances, we already have stock on the shelves at the old, lower price. The Economics Workbook was ordered for summer courses and orders were inflated because we believed the book would be used in the fall. For this reason there were over one hundred copies still on the shelves when the fall stock arrived with a new, higher list price. To prevent people buying the more expensive copy by mistake, we kept these in the stockroom until all of the old shipment were sold. The annoying thing about all this is that a small commercial bookstore, marking up old stock to match the new prices, would never be faced with this particular complaint.

The S.C.M. Bookroom operates a discount system of 10 percent on any book that carries a 40 percent discount from the publisher. They use the publisher's list price on virtually all other books, and do not carry most of the 20 percent titles carried at the Textbook Store. Bob Miller, an ex-manager of S.C.M., uses the same system. Obviously, they can be very selective in what they carry. I am sure that the total inventory of either store would be less than 10 percent of that in stock in September at the Textbook Store. Almost all of the books that they choose not to carry are textbooks which carry a 20 percent discount from the publisher. The average operating expense for two hundred and forty college stores across North America last year was 23.3 percent of total sales; at the University of Toronto it was slightly lower. The sale of textbooks at 20 percent is not a profit-making enterprise, so long as the bookstore operator is not making the decisions about what to order and is responsible for the supply of all text additions.

Some years ago, I believe the S.A.C. did operate a book exchange. Sellers put whatever price they hoped to obtain in the book and then called back every once in a while to check whether or not the book had sold. The S.A.C. picked up 15 percent of the selling price. When this not very successful operation ended, the Bookstores began a used book programme of buying back any on-course text for half the retail price. This means that students sometimes get less for the books, but they are not faced with the possibility of collecting their books from the S.A.C. office in April because they haven't sold. It also means that any given student can buy a text at 75 percent of list and sell it back at 50 percent the following year, providing it is still on course. The administration of the used book programme (extra staff, producing lists, etc.) prevents this from being profitable unless a great many more books become available, but it does help us a little in estimating order quantities for new books.

Copies of the Bookstores Pricing Policies are available from the Manager of the Textbook Store or myself.

Medieval quacks

The Toronto media have been woefully remiss in the debate raging around the energy question by giving ill-considered publicity to such frauds as Fred Knelman, Greenpeace, and other "ecology" groups.

It is easily demonstrable that environmentalist groups are incompetent; that they are suspiciously funded to act against industry, labor, and science. Since Gross National Product, longevity, and an industrial development policy go hand-in-hand with rising per-capita energy consumption, is the press doing the public a service by giving excessive publicity to quacks that would return us to medieval conditions?

Nuclear power is much safer than coal (the only feasible alternative when oil and gas run out): there has not been one fatal accident at a commercial nuclear power plant. Nuclear power is necessary for an industrial society and without energy expansion, half of the world's population will have to die.

Let those who deny this, write us a letter on parchment, using a goose-quill, and send it by Pony Express.

Open letter to John Evans

It has come to our attention that senior administrators from the South African University of Stellenbosch will be meeting with their University of Toronto counterparts on the 5th and 6th of October.

As you are aware: the University of Stellenbosch is an elite university that caters to the well-to-do in South Africa's Afrikaner ruling circles. The Nationalist Party, which has been in power in South Africa since 1948 and which originated the policy of apartheid, has drawn three of its four prime ministers from Stellenbosch. The very men who formulated the policy of apartheid, including H. F. Verwoerd, third Nationalist Prime Minister, were recruited from the ranks of Stellenbosch's faculty. The current prime minister, John Vorster, is the University of Stellenbosch's chancellor. And if all of this is not sufficient documentation of the close ties between the apartheid regime and the University of Stellenbosch consider the fact that white vigilante groups were organized from its campuses during the protests that followed the Soweto demonstrations of June 1976.

It would quite clearly be wrong for the University of Toronto administration to meet with their opposite numbers from any South African university that participates in and capitulates before the apartheid system. Such a meeting would only be used by the South African government to legitimize their apartheid educational system. But the University of Stellenbosch is a unique case: it not only participates in apartheid, it organizes and administers apartheid.

It is completely unacceptable to University of Toronto students that their administrators should host senior administrators from such an institution. We commend the individuals in the administration who have refused to participate in such meetings and we recommend strongly to you the resolution of the Scarborough College Council that such an encounter would be "deplorable." We would advise that you immediately cancel your invitation: there is no place on the University of Toronto campuses for the architects of apartheid.

Welcome Back!

By MARK LUKASIEWICZ

It's 9 p.m. and the second floor of 91 St. George St. veritably creaks under the strain of yet another Varsity production night. Cries of "Where's that pic?" and "What's the count on 6-1?" rise above the general clatter of typewriters and telephones.

For hundreds of former Varsity staff attending tonight's Varsity reunion dinner at Hart House, the scene described above will recall memories of production nights as far back as 1912, scarcely four years after The Varsity had changed from a "review of university thought and literature" to a thrice weekly newspaper. From those shaky beginnings in 1880, the Varsity reached its hiatus as a daily newspaper twenty years ago, and it remains Canada's largest and most influential student newspaper.

The Varsity has spanned eras: our pages have deplored Hitler and mourned Kennedy; we have roused the patriotism of some generation and condemned the complacency of others; and always, we have opposed governments as if it were second nature.

Many Varg hacks will be happy to know that the Varsity continues to criticize and be criticized by the Students' Administrative Council. Our "editorial independence", a nebulous term at best, hovers in limbo as it did in 1931, 1952, and countless other occasions when editors were fired for one transgression or another.

But, as always, the Varsity does not devote itself solely to student government. Our stories have often been the subject of angry criticism from the government benches at Queen's Park. In the words of Ian Montagues, "It's not coincidental that there are at Queen's Park today two former editors, C. M. Godfrey and Michael Cassidy, in the Opposition, but none on the Government bench. In fact, the Varsity of 1890 rejected a poem by William Lyon Mackenzie King.

The Varsity has changed over the years, but it remains fundamentally what it has always been: in the words of an anonymous wise man, a newspaper "in the forefront of progressive journalism."

Money not a barrier

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY
Ontario provincial New Democratic Party (NDP) leadership candidate Ian Deans said last Tuesday that people should go to school for their own personal experience, not just to get a job. Deans spoke to a handful of students at Scarborough College.

Elaborating on the educational system, he stated education should be regarded as a right and that the present government would never be able to get that point through "its rather elderly head."

Deans feels students should be allowed to attend post-secondary institutions without having to be the offspring of wealthy people. "Kids who, at the age of 18, attain legal age of majority should be treated as such when being considered for a place in a university."

Parents' income should have nothing to do with the accessibility of education, said Deans.

By establishing a truly progressive tax system in the province, we can make sure that those people who can benefit from education and who are capable of achieving results will be able to attend these kinds of institutions regardless of their socio-economic background," he said.

Deans says he believes student employment is a grave problem and that students are not provided with study-related jobs. However, he could offer no solutions to alleviate these concerns.

When asked about the state of the economy, Deans gave his audience an idea of his perceptions of the problems and how his party would go about solving them.

"Our resources are not owned by the U.S., but the companies extracting them are," he said. He put forth the idea that a tariff system limiting the exporting of raw materials, thus creating an incentive to build a manufacturing sector in the province, would be better than unilateral nationalization in the long run. He did not, however, rule out the possibility of some forms of government-owned industry.

"It is essential, indeed of paramount importance, that this province move away from resource-based industries into a manufacturing-based private sector. Otherwise, within the not too distant future, we shall become an economic backwater when those finite resources finally dry up," he said.

On the question of the present unity crisis, he stated that in the event of his winning the leadership and of his party's forming the next government, he would try to talk to the Premier of Quebec and see if an arrangement could be worked out.

"The Prime Minister should not be engaging in political warfare in Quebec. Instead he should be trying to find accommodations to the problem. Furthermore, we should not close the door to any constructive suggestion on the future of this country," he stated. He also feels the anglophone in Quebec is far better off than is the francophone in Ontario.

Tecumseh at ROM

By DAVID HEALEY

"The last international war on Canadian soil" is the new subject of interest at the Canadiana Department of the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM). The war of 1812 exhibit, which began last week, is a unique collection of paintings, lithographs, medals, and guns illustrating the battles and heroes of the great war.

One of the proudest and most interesting exhibits of the ROM is the authentic compass given to Tecumseh, the Shawnee Indian Chief by General Isaac Brock with the inscription To Tecumseh from Brock, Fort Detroit, August 1812.

The exhibition consists largely of paintings of various battles by both American and British artists. Most of the paintings were done before 1820, usually by the veterans of the war itself. There are also lithographs that were printed in the 1830's and 40's, book illustrations from the 1850's and newspaper articles from the 60's and 70's.

The exhibition guarantees a wide diversity of opinion concerning battles and events. For instance, the death of Tecumseh at the Battle of the Thames is depicted in three different paintings, each with a different version of how the Indian leader died.

The exhibition got off to a great start on Tuesday, September 27 when a reception was held for past ROM board chairmen. F. S. Fielding, the Deputy British Consul and John R. Diggins Jr., the U.S. Consul spoke at the affair and aptly "represented the two protagonists" of the war according to Beatrice Fischer, of the Provincial and Public Relations Board.

Strick struggles with flick, but film still has rhetoric

Transferring a piece from one art form to another is a difficult task, mainly because the artist has to deal with the limitations presented by both forms. Of course, the artist does not have to remain faithful to the characteristics of the original. But if one tries to remain sympathetic in the transference, then the difficulties begin to arise.

A work develops along the lines dictated by the characteristics of the art form, for instance a novel takes a certain shape because it is indirectly communicated by the artist to the audience by means of the written form of a language. Film also has limitations based on the physical characteristics of its projection upon a two dimensional screen of those things that are actually able to be filmed or animated.

Joseph Strick has dealt with these problems in his film of the James Joyce novel, A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man which opened last night at the Cinema. The book presents many difficulties to the director, the most obvious being the cinematic presentation of the development and workings of the consciousness of Stephen Dedalus. In an earlier film, Joyce's Ulysses, Strick made extensive use of mental images, placing them on the same plane of importance and often confusing them with physical and "objective" images. However, in this new film, we remain totally on the latter plane of reality except for two brief sequences. This certainly is a departure from the mode of presentation used in the novel.

But Strick does not make use of cinematic techniques that would add to the raw materials of the novel itself. So what we have is very much a spoken movie.

The movie follows the flow of the book, but purges certain less vital sections so that more time can be spent on a select few scenes. The first few years of Stephen's life are, as in the book, handled pithily, and some of these scenes fail because insufficient time is used to develop them. In fact it is not until the Christmas dinner scene that the movie finally gets untracked. Of course, the dialogue that Joyce lends Strick here is very powerful; Strick adds little to it with his visual technique. But maybe this is the only possibility to the filmmaker if he does not wish to change the scene immensely. It is conflict; conflict between people in close proximity both physical and cultural, yet people who have to deal with the contradictions of their lives. In this scene and throughout most of the movie, it remains first and foremost a child of the book and does not transcend that origin.

Of all the sections, Joyce himself failed most miserably in his description of the deflowering of young Dedalus. His perspective is too spiritual, too intellectual, and not animal enough. The limitations of the film mode in displaying sexual passions are much less pronounced than that of the novel. As a result we feel more of the physical urgency of the situation, and are more carried away by the importance of the moment. Strick pointed out the difficulty of translating lines like: "He closed his eyes, surrendering himself to her, body and mind, conscious of nothing in the world but the dark pressure of her softly parting lips. They pressed upon his brain as though they were the vehicle of a vague speech; and between them he felt an unknown and timid pressure, darker than the swoon of sin, softer than sound or odour." A strict rendering of such lines might be impossible; the film chooses an alternative and succeeds.

On the other hand, the clip which fails in the film, is the hell-fire speech given on the feast of St. Francis Xavier. The preacher is John Gielgud, one of the great speakers in the modern British theatre. He carries the scene as far as it goes. But that is scant far indeed. The scene consists entirely of shots of Gielgud, thundering from the pulpit about the damnation one shall suffer in hell, and shots of the audience of young boys, and especially Stephen, who is agonizing about the sins he has committed. Actually it is rather a boring scene, except for the terrifying lines and Gielgud's great delivery. Even Bosco Hogan, as Stephen, who otherwise gives a great performance, fails miserably in this scene; he's tried to convey some measure of the anguish he is feeling but merely looks to be suffering from piles. Portrait as the film fails here because it does not act like a film, and remains merely a transferred novel.

Portrait as film succeeds in only those sequences where it tries to portray those factors which heavily influenced Stephen's development, rather than either try to get inside his head and listen to the ticking or trace the spoken thoughts he expresses to friends and family. Scenes of the old men of Ireland wasting their lives away in bars. Stephen's father as a jealous and bitter man, and scenes of Dublin itself, lifeless and cold are moderately successful. But the basic reason that Portrait as film succeeds, is because that the original, the novel by Joyce, provides very moving dialogue and powerful scenarios. Strick adds little to these raw materials.

Underground surfaces at CEAC

The Independent Cinema, Avant-Garde Films Underground Movies, there are just about as many names for it as there are films. To anyone who was at all conscious during the late 1960s, the phrase "underground movie" is probably the easiest starting point for this review.

Any Time magazine reader knows what an underground film is. It's Andy Warhol's Empire: an eight hour long film showing the Empire State Building from one camera position. Or it's a "protest film" with rapidly intercut shots of Richard Nixon, a pig, war footage and the film's director balling his girlfriend.

The apocalypse, having at the very least been deferred, the term underground movie is no longer in vogue.

Today one speaks of Independent films. But no matter what one calls it all of the terms used have always carried connotations of being apart from the film scene at large and not being "commercial cinema". In many cases we are not dealing with self imposed exile. Those who decide what plays on television and in the movie theatres are extremely suspicious of any short film that isn't a Tom and Jerry cartoon or a travelogue on sunny Nigeria.

The biggest problem facing the independent filmmaker is that of getting his or her work shown. The distribution hassles were remedied years ago by co-operatives like the London Filmmakers Co-op or Toronto's Canadian Filmmaker's Distribution Centre, where filmmakers get a fair deal on any profit that their film makes. The only other problem is exhibition; just where can one see and show independent or experimental films? If you work at an ad agency you will probably see a fair number of the flashier works down in the company's screening room. Otherwise you'll have to depend on art galleries like A Space or AGO (the latter dealing largely with works that have made it with the critics). At least that's the way it was until The Funnel opened.

Housed in the basement of the Centre for Experimental Art and Communication (CEAC) at 15 Duncan St. (right behind Ed's Warehouse. That's right! Where the Crash 'n' Burn used to be) is what is hoped will become Toronto's first permanent exhibition space for independent films. The filmmakers affiliated with CEAC, headed by Ross McLaren, have put in a fair bit of time and effort into turning the old Crash 'n' Burn space into a functional, small movie theatre capable of showing works in both 16mm and Super 8.

Ross and his co-workers plan to have regular showings every Tuesday night. These shows will be anything from selections from the CFDC, retrospectives of a particular filmmaker's works, shows by visiting filmmakers, and of course open screenings where anyone can bring their films, finished or otherwise. It is hoped that this will promote and sustain an audience for experimental film and provide filmmakers with a source of "feedback".

Last Tuesday was The Funnel's opening night. On hand was a special presentation by the London Filmmaker's Co-op, one of the world's oldest and largest distributors of independent films. The show was hosted by Co-op member filmmaker Tim Bruce who is travelling across North America with a selection of the Co-op's most recent films. Part of his selection will be shown next Wednesday (Oct. 5, 9:00 p.m.) at the Art Gallery of Ontario, and although The Funnel screening was made up of a different set of films, having seen last Tuesday's show, I can safely say that next Wednesday's should be seen by anyone interested in independent films. If all of this is new to you then the AGO show can serve as a good introduction to some aspects of avant-garde cinema.

The Co-op's recent works are in a style which is currently being called Structuralist. I have no doubt that if you were to approach most of the filmmakers who are being so labelled that they would promptly deny it. Labels aside, it was fairly obvious though that throughout the screening at The Funnel there was a concern with the basics of film.

There was a wide range of style and material from the handmade films. Not every film was an immediate

Nikon of the north

The backwoods of nineteenth century Canada would seem easy prey for any director given to weeping into beer glasses. Jean Beaudin's J.S. Martin Photographer fortunately transmits the inherent pathos of the subject with a minimum of (maple) syrup.

The story is unaffectedly parable-like. When J.A., photographer, plans his yearly portrait junket to Maine, he finds his wife Rose-Aimee determined to accompany him (being stuck in the kitchen has made her testy). The trip serves as a backdrop to their mutually antagonistic personalities: he — detached and faint-hearted, she — ebullient and gutsy.

The film's celebrated photography (complete with kudos from Cannes) renders most of the interior shots as still lifes, vignettes as compositionally ordered as one of J.A.'s photographs. Panning is reserved almost exclusively for exterior shots (one of the most effective is a long scan of the faces of some sawmill workers).

Beaudin's generally sustained finesse falters at a few points. A couple of stabs at overt social commentary are rather clumsily belaboured and unnecessary (we do not, for example, need to be told the sawmill workers' hourly wage to realize they are being exploited). Likewise the symbolism is occasionally overplayed: one of the more trite examples features J.A. sitting beside an empty chair and looking on as his wife participates in a dance.

The title, by the way, is something of a misnomer; J.A. is not only a secondary character in relation to his wife, but is also thoroughly out-classed on all fronts. The stamina, moral courage, and altruism are all on her side.

As the film progresses, one increasingly finds him being predictably callous, and her just as predictably coy. The parable ends with Rose-Aimee come back to bed, board, and brood, apparently quite happy with all three. Next year she will assuredly not attempt the trip. These lapses into banality, however, are amply atoned for by an exquisite overall choreography and a visual inventiveness which nearly belies the need for dialogue.

Fantasy fails to fulfil Magic Flute

If criticism is the art of comparing and analyzing the subjective against more objective standards, then I must confess bafflement with respect to the new Canadian Opera Company production of The Magic Flute at the O'Keefe Centre. By any standards it seems to be a good show, yet I was disappointed.

I thought that I understood the Magic Flute, that is, the various issues and complexities that may be played with by any enterprising interpreter (Bergman for example).

The core of the plot is the quest of Tamino, a prince who is persuaded to attempt a rescue of Pamina, daughter of the Queen of the Night. Tamino falls madly in love with Pamina when he sees her portrait and is thus easily convinced to take up the quest. His companion is the Queen's bird-catcher, Papageno.

We soon learn that Pamina was not abducted by an evil magician as the Queen had said, but by the priest of the Temple of Wisdom, Sarastro, who wants Tamino to become both an initiate and Pamina's husband. Tamino arrives at the temple as expected, but instead of first asking after Pamina, claims to be seeking wisdom. Papageno accompanies Tamino on the resultant rites of initiation, that make up most of the second act, himself failing where Tamino succeeds.

The flute in the title really is magic, transforming enemies into friends, much like any well-played musical instrument. As a sub-theme to the temptation ordeal that Tamino and Papageno must endure, lurks Mozart's pro-musical propaganda: an argument for the moral and transformative power of art.

The COC production did not avoid these, or the many other issues lurking in the complexity of the Magic Flute. Whatever the problem, I was left with the impression that Mozart and Schikaneder wrote an incomprehensible work.

The onus is on a director to attempt to create coherence even where there is none. That is not usually such a difficult feat with the Magic Flute.

Consider the material that director Bliss Hebert had to work with at the COC. The cast was excellent. Pamina, Tamino and Papageno all looked and sounded youthful as well as musical. Sarastro and the Queen of the Night offered presence and power both physically and vocally. The opulent fantasy set from the previous National Arts Centre production was enhanced by special-effects wizardry.

Hebert played up the fantasy aspect. If this had been done consistently, the effect might have been magnificent: the direction produces stunning visual effects that really do seem to be from a fantasy world, but a world that is not internally consistent. The three ladies who are effectively the evil Queen's infantry, are powerful enough to slay serpents, but when they come to tempt Tamino and Papageno merely wave their arms and sing from one side of the stage. Their stasis is inexplicable in a scene in which they are provoking the action, and inexcusable when they are meant to suggest some sort of threat.

Similarly, Hebert wasted the talents of Phil Stark, a gifted character tenor, as the Moore, Monostatos. Stark evidently executed his direction, but was never given the opportunity to be more than a comic diversion.

Herbert's treatment did not seem to be an attempt to reconcile the contrary elements of a highly symbolic plot. Emphasizing fantasy may facilitate allegory; but when the illusion appears to be an end in itself, it will interfere with the allegory.

The contrary elements of the plot that I mentioned arise from the role of Papageno, who attempts initiation with Tamino. Tamino is almost too serious, and opens himself to ridicule; Papageno demonstrates the folly of everyone in the opera, except for Sarastro. Hebert's heavily static fantasy is wide open to this sort of ridicule. Monostatos and Papageno — the only light characters in the opera — don't steal the show, but have it handed to them on a silver platter. The seriousness of the second-last scene is lost when the Queen's threat to Sarastro's realm is carried out by the three hapless ladies and Monostatos. The inept staging makes this too painful for laughter.

To mock the Queen is a fair intention, but not in this context. The following tableau of Sarastro and his assembled hierarchy, rooted to the monolithic set as if glued in place, was painfully static. Instead of a sense of a victory, there is only hollow pomp, a direct consequence of the previous "comical" scene. I seriously question whether Herbert knew what he was doing in the choral finale, keeping action to a minimum where the music cries out for some movement.

Yet the ending didn't destroy the effect, but only showed the weakness of the approach in the extreme.

Leo Goeke and Patricia Wells as Tamino and Pamina were both credible as the foolishly impetuous lovers who learn their lesson. Goeke's singing was the more spectacular, once he escaped the forty-foot dragon in the first scene (reason enough for the jitters). Robert Lloyd's Sarastro manages to be warm, round, and even clearly enunciated in O'Keefe Centre. He and Deborah Cook were required to play a static interpretation, so most of their acting was in their music.

The Mozart lovers of Toronto should be advised that this production is marvellously sung, although the overture is a disappointment. Those who come to the opera via Bergman's film should realize that stasis in a close-up may work, but poses problems in the O'Keefe Caverns. Hebert's direction is a marvellous fantasy that lovers of this opera would see sympathetically, although their expectations would not fully be met.

Innovative not Caged by convention

John Cage is one of the most influential and innovative composers of this century. In large part, his ideas have moved the course of twentieth century art music. Cage began and influenced the stream toward the improvisatory aleatory music. This year on the occasion of his sixty-fifth birthday, festivals of his music are being held all over the world. He will be in Toronto tomorrow when he will give a free informal lecture at the Music Gallery at 30 St. Patrick St. On Saturday evening, his music will be featured in the first of this season's New Music Concerts series. To obtain more information or make a reservation call 967-5257. Jackie London spoke to him about his music.

Q. How do you see yourself in light of other composers of the twentieth century?

A. I think that we're moving in a time that has many people, not just musicians, moving in many directions. It's not just each culture staying by itself, but there is an interpenetration of orient and occident. Serious and pop music are getting mixed up; the results of technology particularly electronics is used by both. Formerly people thought of art as one stream but now it's like a big field; there is not one direction.

Q. But you, you're so different from everybody else. Right from the beginning you always did things that were radically innovative. Wherever did you get such ideas? Whatever put such things in your head?

A. My father was an inventor. He would have liked me to follow in his footsteps: electronic engineering. He was disappointed when he found I loved music. I learned from him the desire to make discoveries. We were friends in the end after a long period of estrangement. He was one of those who came to all my concerts.

Q. Everything you do is so different and without precedent. Even today, but especially in the early days, it must have caused a tremendous shock and the rejection must have been very trying.

A. I just went on with my work. When I wrote my Sonata for Clarinet I took it to the first clarinetist of the Los Angeles Philharmonic and he refused to perform it, he said music shouldn't be written this way. I asked him how it should be written and he said "Like Mozart". Then I sent it to San Francisco and was promised it would be played for an informal concert in someone's living room. I hitchhiked up. The clarinetist was not yet there when I arrived. I looked forward to hearing it and I waited. When he arrived it was found he hadn't yet looked at the piece. When he saw it he refused to play it. So I sat down and played it myself on the piano. When people don't do it I assume it's my responsibility.

Q. What do you personally consider a great critic, what's wrong with what critics are doing, and who do you personally think is the greatest critic?

Marshall McLuhan. His attitude toward art, society, technology, is that of a detective. He has tried to discover what actually happened in the world and to illuminate the circumstance. Because of their work composers make discoveries. I was struck by McLuhan's work because his conclusions were the same as mine. He also made discoveries I hadn't made. I found him illuminating as a guide to making discoveries. Critics just say what is good and bad and these are value judgements and as such they can only rely on past judgements, they do not look into the future.

How do you feel about the compositional process?

A. If we liken it to language — which I don't mean to do — each is working in a different way than a neighbour. David Tudor, with whom I was associated for some time, tries to make each work follow a different process as my father did. If it's a question of making choices, I've changed it for myself to asking questions which are answered by chance. I'm working on a series of questions comparable to computer programming which in itself is merely asking questions. Also I use the I Ching book.

Q. What about musical education, do you think the present style is appropriate for today's music? Do you know of any great music teacher?

A. Murray Schafer of Canada. He's written a beautiful book The New Soundscape about the world around us ... sounds ... the way we could change our life by listening ... going to the point where the student uses his own faculty instead of being forced to memorize names and identify composers; that memorizing is all foolish; some of the present methods are foolish; students should be opening their ears and changing their lives through experience. If a student studies music he studies the work of others. Take a count in any music school. The creators are a minority compared to the history students. In an art school, the historians are in a minority. Schaffer is no longer teaching (he's composing on a farm somewhere in Canada, I think) but creative musicians would be in the majority in his school.

Q. Tell me, to what extent is the creative medium involved in your work, who is the performer or composer, when and how can the performer of your work feel that what he's doing is acceptable to you, and what about the seriousness of intent?

A. Performers are not always given complete freedom. I've been specific about when they are given such freedoms. Sometimes people misinterpret, they simply don't read the notes or direction. At another festival in early August, a concert at the Creative Music Foundation, a performance of Solo for Piano from Concerts for Piano and Orchestra that I wrote in the late 50s, which had many different kinds of notations. There were 6 pianists, all chose different sections. One played a long piece, Japanese-like. I knew I didn't write that, it was very imitative and I asked him how he arrived at it, I thought he was rather vague. I discovered he was interpreting lines instead of dots that I had meant as sounds. He should have been led to sounds to the mind by my notation. It was a clear case where my music was not read carefully. People often don't read clearly written directions, freedoms have been taken where the performer should have been led to something else. I have a somewhat unwarranted reputation for permitting anything. I tried to make myself clear, but people jump not to my conclusions, but their own.

Exile on Spadina St.: Love That Dive

Like everybody, I've got two parents. Unlike everybody though, I was weaned on British rock and roll, so the Beatles and the Rolling Stones were my parents. It's not easy when one of them gets cut down in the prime of life (that's what happened to me back in 1970), and now the other is occasionally slipping into the senility of Black and Blue.

It's true. I did break into cold sweats last year when the Stones released their album. I really thought I was hearing the death rattle then. Love You Live, the parental offering for this year, does show that the basic life functions of the band have stabilized once again, but I'm still not going to give out any A-1 fitness scores until I hear the Stones next studio product.

Love You Live technically opens with tracks cut in Paris at the Aventure during the first week of June 1976. Technically that is, for the Glimmer Twins do some fancy mixing and at times what we in fact seem to be listening to, is a synthesis derived from using portions of a song recorded both in Paris and at the El Mocambo. Certainly the Stones cut the most stunning performance of "Honky Tonk Women" they probably ever gave here in Toronto (and they must realize that themselves) but it appears on this album in the so-called Paris version.

Those who have never seen this band live will quickly find that the Stones are slightly looser in concert than in the studio. The presence of almost full-time sideman, Billy Preston, has left its mark on the Stones sound, and not always to the group's benefit. "If You Can't Rock Me" merges out of its middle eight disco shuffle into a Prestonized "Get Off Of My Cloud," in which Billy even takes the honour of backing vocals. At this rate the Stones will soon be as boring to listen to as Preston is himself.

But the real unforgivable sin during the French show comes with the inclusion of "Hot Stuff," the weak talkover-version jive shuffle from Black and Blue, made all the more incomprehensible due to Jagger's flirtation with the art of marbles-in-the-mouth style of singing. But the knowledge that a huge thirty-foot inflatable penis is rising out of the stage helps the Stones shift their gears back into place for "Star Star."

The Paris concert includes the expected run through of big hits, though "Angie," "Fool To Cry," and "Doo Doo Doo Doo Doo (Heartbreaker)" fail to make an appearance. But the Stones' fatal Achilles heel is exposed, in that the Stones have incredibly poor backing vocals when in concert. This is evident with "Yumblin' Dice," which is much weaker than the version from Exile On Main St.

Side three opens under the neon palms of the good ol' El Mocambo. The band shifts from their standard hits and features some rare titbits they have either never played live before, or played just so long ago that nobody can really remember when. Certainly it is this side of Love You Live that makes the album all worthwhile.

Featuring some harmonica playing from Jagger that is heard all too seldom these days, the lads launch into a nice long version of the blues track "Mannish Boy." Certainly this is what they sounded like when they were the house band at the Craw-

Daddy Rhythm and Blues Club back when they last played the clubs in an early sixties. No special effects, such as taped violins and echo chambers, just straight music, played much tighter than in Paris too.

"Crackin' Up", a reggae number, follows and it is certainly superior to last year's "Cherry, Oh Baby." But for many the highlight comes when both Richard and Wood take slide guitars and slip the band in the bluesy "Little Red Rooster." One has to remember this song defied all critics by becoming a British number one hit for the band back at the height of the Liverpool beat boom in 1964. Finally after giving a hello to "Margaret" the band pulls the stops to close the side with Chuck Berry's "Around and Around." Ah, shades of 12 x 5 all over again.

Throughout the album Jagger constantly works his audience up to the point of frenzy (and never more so than during the sing-along version of "You Can't Always Get What You Want"), but it is Richard's guitar that ushers the band off the stage. He erupts into possibly the Stones' greatest anthem, "Brown Sugar," which calls the group back for an encore of "Jumpin' Jack Flash". By this point no one cares the song is being pushed at breakneck speed, nor is anyone upset that Jagger sounds like he is trying to strangle his words to death before releasing them to the sanctity of the microphone.

The band returns for a final encore along with the cracking of explosions, and they immediately transform "Sympathy For The Devil" into a Charlie Watts showpiece. He, Wyman and Ollie Brown lay down the most powerful rhythm of the entire album on this cut, and it certainly becomes no mystery as to where the real magic of the Stones lies.

Thus we end yet another chapter in the history of the Rolling Stones, in which we find our lads pulling back from the brink of disaster (where they left us last year) and turning in the most worthy performance ever to emerge from beneath the depths of an aborted album design. Really now, isn't it just about time somebody took Andy Warhol's crayons away?

Bradstreet lulls folkly crowd

Last Thursday SAC had its first of its Tattle Creek Folk concert series in the Innis Townhall. The featured performer was A&M recording artist David Bradstreet and his bass player-clarinetist Carl.

During the first set, Bradstreet played some of his better known tunes. They were met with half-hearted, scattered applause. Actually, the audience was unusually quiet throughout the evening. At one point Bradstreet commented sarcastically, "We have a rowdy bunch here tonight." It was not, however, a strained relationship between the singer and the audience. Bradstreet's style of easy listening folk produces a quiet, relaxed atmosphere. In short, we got what we would expect of Bradstreet — music by which to unwind.

In the second set, David and Carl were joined by Jim Neil, Bradstreet's drummer. He added a little zest to the music which had hitherto been missing. Neil also played bass while Carl played the clarinet.

Overall, the concert was good. However, Bradstreet played one instrumental rather sloppily. He told us that he wrote this song after being inspired by a bout of sea-sickness while crossing from Maine to an island ten miles away. Well, he certainly caught this effect in his song. In my opinion, he is much better at using his voice than playing the guitar. Perhaps to counter-balance the effect of this instrumental, he sang a beautiful song without any accompaniment called "My Irish Home". This song really showed the quality of his voice. Few singers will dare to sing alone.

The second set included both old favourites like "Renaissance", and new songs like "Ashes on the Water". The audience showed their appreciation by asking for an encore, which Bradstreet gave them. It was a good evening's entertainment for a buck and liquid refreshments will be available at the rest of the concerts in this series.

Spot Freddy and win a date with MacTavish.

Backstreet Beauty lush and loud

The talented rhythm and blues white boys have traded in their sweet Philly sound for a more rock-and-roll sound on Beauty on a Backstreet. The album displays the usual lush production and the perceptive lyrics are as enjoyable as ever, but songs like "Don't Change" and "Bad Habits and Infections" are definitely performed to be played LOUD. The electric guitar of producer Chris Bond and the drumming of Jeff Porcaro dominate the sound and create the tougher rock feel of the LP.

John Oates continues to write catchy melodies for his love songs, especially "The Girl Who Used to Be" and "Love Hurts, (Love Heals)". Daryl Hall provides the most unusual track on the LP in "Winged Bull". The song has an eastern mystical feel to it and apparently Hall has stated that it is his ode to the occult, one of his current interests.

Hall and Oates continue to excel in the use of vocal harmonies — the singing is a highlight of "Beauty" as it is on all their albums — and there are few other vocal duos in the area of rock music today that can match their arrangements.

The music is danceable and the album would be welcomed at any party, making it a worthwhile purchase for any rock music aficionado. Hall and Oates fans may be disillusioned at the loss of the 'Sara Smile' style, but pleasantly surprised at the boys' exploration into their rock-and-roll roots. As John Oates simply states in "Bigger Than Both of Us"; "Nothing really lasts forever". Hall and Oates have left their unique rhythm and blues for a little bit of rock-and-roll, and the results are both successful and satisfying.

Where there's a Swill, there's a Way

Bryan Way, who played the Turning Point last Saturday night, is without argument a folkie, no matter how much he or anyone else dislikes the stigma. A seasoned performer of six years in this town, Way has done various local clubs, college pubs, and has once even opened for Joan Baez; but until he takes a good hard look at what he's doing, he's not going to break the stigma. Way is a good song-writer possibly capable of doing something better than the standard folk tune, but he does not sing or play as well as he writes.

Where Do You Go, recorded the summer of '76, is Way's first album. It's a collection of ten original songs, one of which has been recorded quite successfully by Roger Whittaker in England, but neither Way's album, nor the song itself ("Say My Goodbyes To The Rain") sound as if it's going to do for Way what it did for Whittaker. Quite simply the album is a mess both musically and technically.

Although dominated by a number of weak and average folk songs, "One Of These Days" is craftier than most; but since it is done so timidly, much of Way's skill in the song is lost. "All I Need Is You" sounds like a James to Carly number, and just like Taylor's own treatment of such songs, it is boring because it lacks conviction. "Where Do You Go" falls into the same trap. Way keeps the same melody for six tedious verses, never once adding an extra inflection or derivation, either vocally or instrumentally.

Is it still true that groan-moaning, sweet-sympathy songs endemic to early folk careers will still send listeners to the record store? I concede that Dan Hill and James Taylor have sold thanks to such an image, promoted at their first release, but superior artists have kept away from these traps.

Even if Way wants his first impression to be one of folkiness and sensitivity, he'll make no headway with a title cut like "Where Do You Go". The only impression this gives is one of mediocrity. It is not unreasonable that an artist should produce something beyond bland, standard folk. If an album or singer is to make any such impression at all he's got to surpass both Hill and Taylor, not so great a feat as some think.

Now, "Carnival Queen" is a cut above the rest. It's stronger and even sticks in your mind. Departing from the norm, it plays well and taunts the rest of the album. Lenny Solomon adds some familiar violin that does much for the refrain, but Way's guitar is still weak.

The band on this album remains the big problem. On "A Test of Time" a Maternick-style bar song, the arranger deliberates leaves a gap for solos. Way, and musicians Brian Russel and Bob Lucier get a chance to really let loose and show what they can do, but instead of giving either fancy or even elementary licks, they play something short of the ridiculous-shapeless and pointless guitar.

It's honestly painful to listen as a notable song is watered down by mediocre musicians, and is sung by a voice that's strongly resonant but obviously new and therefore not yet tuned.

To remedy this man's general presentation, there's only one thing to do. A string of one-nighters, club-dates and appearances would get him money enough to hire some decent musicians and more importantly a competent arranger-producer — someone who's going to pay attention and be able to tell him what's going on both in the studio and in folk generally.

I am reminded of a former teacher who, angry that the bunch of us had no idea of history, complained: "You people are under the impression that history began the day you were born." I feel the same about Bryan Way. Does he think that he's a folk pioneer? Granted, he is only 24 and has the experience of only one album, but anyone with at least the use of their hearing has to marvel that folkies like Joni Mitchell and Bruce Cockburn are moving into areas of music yet unclassified. That is not to say that Way is going to follow the same road. It merely points out that listeners expect much more of folk singers. Artists like Mitchell, Cockburn, and even MacLachlan give the stigma a place to go. Way has not yet made it palatable.

Before you BUY - ask yourself these questions: Does the FM tuner section guarantee high performance of spurious rejection and high sensitivity? Does it include the very latest in electronics for constant stable and top quality sound reproduction from small to large power output? Are you going to be proud to own it for a long, long time?

PIONEER's new and elegantly designed SX-1250 AM/FM receiver, shown above, does indeed meet all these requirements. It also offers mammoth continuous power output of 160 watts per channel, min. RMS at 8 ohms, from 20 Hertz to 20,000 Hertz, with no more than 0.1% total harmonic distortion. It is unlikely that the technical quality and handsome appearance of the SX-1250 could be matched by others at the price.

PIONEER's SX-1050 offers continuous power output of 120 watts per channel, the SX-950 - 85 watts per channel, the SX-850 - at 65 watts per channel, the SX-750 at 50 watts per channel, min. RMS at 8 ohms, from 20 to 20,000 Hertz with no more than 0.1% total harmonic distortion. The SX-650, SX-550 and SX-450 offer continuous power output of 35 watts, 20 watts and 15 watts respectively per channel, min. RMS at 8 ohms, 20 to 20,000 Hertz with no more than from 0.3% to 0.5% total harmonic distortion. Check them out personally - you'll be delighted.

Downtown Development

If you go south of Front Street east of Yonge, you will be standing in some of the dirtier remnants of Toronto's history. The original town of York was directly north; the lake came up to where Esplanade is, and the docks were a bit to the east. The railway came through the area in the 1850s and brought industrial development with it. By the 1920s the areas to the north and east had developed as a fairly solid working class neighbourhood. But the post-war era, when transport and energy were cheap, saw much of the industry moving out of the centre of the city to the periphery where land was cheap and there were few restrictions on their development. The trend still continues.

Now, as of Wednesday, another kind of development has begun: The Lawrence area over the next five years will be rebuilt as a residential neighbourhood, providing living space for 7,000 to 9,000 people. The project is being built by the Housing Department of the City of Toronto and four non-profit developers: the Toronto Non-Profit Co-operative Housing Federation, the Labour Council Development Foundation, Harmony Housing Co-operative and Cathedral Court Housing Co-operative; the project is geared to low to moderate income groups.

The full site is bounded by Yonge, Front, Parliament and the CNR railway tracks: approximately 44 acres, an extremely large expansive site for a downtown project. The first phase is the area between Jarvis and Sherbourne. When completed, in about a year and a half, its 700 units will house about 1,500 people in a mixture of families and individuals along with about 15,000 square feet of retail space (10-15 small stores catering to local needs), a separate school and a public school, a health clinic and day care centre. It is a housing project, but after that, the similarities between it and, say, Regent Park end.

Unlike Regent Park and Alexander Park, the street, the traditional North American form-giver, is the major organizing element. While Regent Park takes its form from one of Le Corbusier's outrageous schemes to tear down half of Paris and replace it with monstrous 60-storey cruciform towers (4 or 5 storey in Regent Park), and while Alexander Park was concocted out of the same logic which produced such marvels as New College: St. Lawrence is based on nothing more remarkable than a Toronto neighbourhood.

The development will be built around a grid of new and existing roads and laneways. A large portion of the housing will take the form of townhouses about four stories tall, the upper two floors being one unit and the lower floors, another. Each has its own access to the street, a small backyard and the lane behind. The laneway is an important element in the scheme as a place of undetermined use: it's a place to park your cash or wash it, or for children to play both publicly and clandestinely. In conception it is not that different from the lanes around College and Manning.

The other central organizer in the project is the park. In total, of the 44 acres over 8 are for the three parks on the site. The major park, the Esplanade, is of particular interest. Running nearly the length of the project, it is the space between Esplanade and Wilton (Esplanade is the major east-west street). At just under 130 feet wide it is not a big park but formal qualities should add a remarkable strength and publicness to the area.

In addition two schools (eventually three) front the Esplanade Park and use it as playground space. The schools themselves are built on second floors and above while the ground floor will house a library or another public function.

One of the interesting sidelights to the project is the context of the area. The whole area south of Queen, east of Jarvis has seen a lot of new businesses and professionals moving in; the Sun has its plant there, George Brown has its graphic art department — Much of the graphics industry in Toronto is centred on King Street; the area probably will only grow stronger and more quickly with the addition of St. Lawrence.

The initial proposition for St. Lawrence is that it is an extension of the city rather than an isolated development. Its layout and philosophy are not that much different from the private development that built much of the housing in the city 60 to 80 years ago, yet there are differences that change its nature: it is much more dense than its comparable neighbourhoods; it is public housing (a distinction rarely lost), and it has a very particular site.

The site produces some very significant problems for the builders. Maybe the greatest is the noise; both the railway and the Gardiner Expressway are just south of the site, and Jarvis, Sherbourne and Parliament are very heavily travelled routes. In certain places the buildings themselves are used as noise buffers with taller buildings on the edge and the smaller rowhouses towards the centre, but it is doubtful that some of the houses and apartments will ever be quiet. Further, almost all the ground has been polluted by long time industrial abuse; the top layer of soil will have to be removed and replaced.

There is also the question of whether a piece can be added onto the city as the architects claim. Although the project makes a great effort to maintain and improve the Front Street edge and to keep traffic connections with the arterial roads on the site, it is still an isolated place.

The project site plan was developed by the Zeidler Partnership; the first buildings to be built are separately designed by Irving Grossman, Jerome Markson, Robinson-Heinrich and Galati Makashima. Hopefully, later on there will be an article here on some of the specific buildings as they begin to take shape. Toronto may not see so important a scheme started for quite a while. The unfortunate part of the idea is that "neighbourhood" as a concept has been forgotten for so long: it seems a little sad that 60-80 years after Toronto defined its neighbourhood organization the wheel has to be re-invented. Whether it will be a neighbourhood or not we won't know until we see if Mr. Submarine gets the corner store.

Jesus farts, Layton leaks the news

The Covenant, by Irving Layton; McClelland and Stewart; 112 pages; $4.95 paper.

Several years ago, when I lived in the Annex, I became acquainted with a gentleman whom I was pleased to address as Albert Flasher. He haunted the Casa Loma steps in full regalia (trenchcoat and argyll knee-socks) greeting the passersby with a warmth that was his alone.

Our first encounter was something of a surprise. I felt confirmed in my status as a Torontonian. The second time I thought I had finally countered Hume's problem of induction. By the fifth confrontation, however, he had become as much a common feature of my nightly walks as the Sealtest factory. What else can you show me Mr. A.?

Irving Layton reminds me very much of Albert (who was, as I recall, circumcized). His aesthetic is based entirely on his ability to shock or outrage. In the introductory note to his new collection of poems The Covenant he notes that "some readers might be offended by the earthiness I impute to Jesus and his Mother, Mary." And he certainly hopes that they are — if the reader accepts Layton's musings on the sound qualities of Jeshua's farts with equanimity the poem lies prostrate on the page, entirely devoid of the life energy which the poem claims is his only muse. It is the duty of the reader to react with something other than yawns. If he or she does not bring tender sensibilities, eyes which are unused to words like fuck and fart and a mindset which conforms to Layton's expectations the poems refuse to take flight.

Such a dependence on the conventionality of the audience is fine for stand-up comics (who are there to observe their audience, and may change direction in mid-routine) but for a writer an acute knowledge of his readers and their attitudes is a necessity. Layton, however, seems to be opening fire in all the wrong directions.

As in his last collection For My Brother Jesus, Layton aims his vitriol at Christians (or Xians as he cutely decides to label them on the off chance that there are some who recall Christ the Jew). His litany of charges is familiar. He reviews the history of the persecution of the Jews; notes that Christians kill one another with smiles on their faces; decries the featurelessness of modern life (which is, of course, entirely the fault of the Xians). Sure Irv, we nod, but haven't you got any other tricks?

Sadly I'm not sure that he does. His love lyrics are flat statements of arrousal ("with only a single glance and the lightest touch of your hand-on my thigh-you have put a deeper tint-into my eyes...") or attempts to affirm the physical nature of love ("I plug the void with my phallus") or gestures in the direction of neo-courtly verse (complete with scatology) as in his poem for his wife 'Aviva'.

I'm sorry Irv, I'd really like to enjoy this volume. I'd like to be able to acknowledge your importance to Canadian poetry in other than historical terms but your verse isn't making it easy. There's too much of it. Are you ceaselessly fecund as you tell us, or is it that your critical sense has been written off as some WASP aberration?

There are moments, spots of wit (the comparison of halos to luminous bagels) snippets of irony (the poets waiting in the snow for Adrienne Clarkson lamenting "What does she care for a poor unhappy mesomorph"). There are even a few poems which appear to have taken more than twenty minutes to write...

But there are not what Layton would have us admire (vide the lesson for reviewers, 'Reviews of Bravo, Layton'). He wants us to laud his attacks on the grey flaccidity of Christian Canada. That's a tough one. It's easy enough to admire anyone who mounts an attack on these one-dimensional times but Layton, who is fatter, and far less lovable than Don Quixote, is forever chasing windmills. Perhaps the faults he waves in our faces should not be truisms, but they are. A great poet might make them fresh again, but Layton (as he would tell us) has too much life for greatness.

Let's hope that, with Brother Jesus now coming home for Saturday dinner on a regular basis, and the death-white Protestants and the blood-red Catholics clutching their X's and trembling at the sound of Jeshua's sandals, the poet may move on. It's too late to hope for much more than outrage but that's a rush too. If you make me mad Irv, I might even spit as you pass.

Roses are red, Violets are blue, Books are beautiful, Whoop-de-doo.

"Eighteen! Number eighteen! Non-fiction prose poetry or children's books. Number eighteen's next!" The cries rang through the crowd of anxious writers, evoking the bustle of Saturday morning at the butcher shop. This marketplace system of order was introduced to accommodate the aspiring poets and authors who flocked to the Blue Pencil Cafe, part of For the Love of Books fair held this past week at Harbourfront, York Quay.

More than fifty writers came to the Cafe, where representatives of various publishing companies and periodicals spent fifteen minutes with each writer, perusing manuscripts and listening to concepts that ranged from collections of poetry to adventure sagas, from cookbooks to memoirs.

Some writers waited more than three hours for the chance to speak privately at the Cafe. One freelance writer, David Pelly, drove in from Bolton to arrive at Harbourfront at five o'clock, in anticipation of a meeting with publishers. By eight o'clock, his number finally came around. Pelly said he felt encouraged by the publisher's interest in his journal of Arctic travel that retraces the routes of previous explorers. "But," said Pelly, "I was going to write it anyway, no matter what they would have said to me."

Other writers seemed disgruntled at the lack of time and empathy afforded to them. Some were scornful of trite comments like, "Look, we really need some rhyme and metre. That's what sells these days," after glancing at selections of painstakingly worked poems. Whatever the outcome, publisher's agents had a novel opportunity to screen unpublished manuscripts, and writers used the Blue Pencil Cafe to discover firsthand the barriers to publishing their manuscripts.

For the Love of Books was much more than this creative dialogue. Fifty exhibits representing more than one hundred and twenty Canadian publishers displayed a selection of current books and periodicals for exhibit and sale. Many Canadian authors attended the fair, autographing copies of their books or reading from their works.

On the night of the Blue Pencil Cafe, the workshop was followed by readings from five Canadian fiction writers. Matt Cohen, Oonah McPhee, Constance Beresford-Howe, Harry Pollack, and Grahame Woods read from their latest novels. Many writers are obviously not good readers, and the range of dramatic impact on this night vacillated between the remarkable and the tedious. Nonetheless, the authors did have a rare chance at public exposure in a country where such encounters are depressingly infrequent.

For the Love of Books also meant fun for kids. Busloads of primary school children toured the exhibits and attended special readings. Dennis Lee, the author of Garbage Delight, found himself to be the object of shrieking adulation by scores of children who recognized him and his popular work.

This is the first year of a Canadian book fair, sponsored and promoted by the Canadian publishing industry. The success of this year's events should mean that the fair be repeated and expanded next year, if for no other reason than the love of books.

Hi! Realism

Ken Danby and the hockey of art

Ken Danby leaned back in his chair, smiled, and whispered "It's an obsession . . . It's the only way to learn". He was speaking about his art.

Is there a place for realism in the Art Gallery of Ontario's contemporary art collection? Only in the lobby, it would appear, and only between the covers of a commercial, coffee-table artbook. So, when Ken Danby, one of Canada's most popular High Realists, arrived at the AGO on Sunday to sign copies of the new glossy catalogue of his paintings, he caused a flurry of excitement and scandal.

The edition Ken Danby contains a running commentary and text by Paul Duval who mounts a searing indictment against the "ill-informed snobbery of such museum keepers and lymphatic academics". Duval includes among these the AGO, which to date has failed to purchase any of Danby's paintings. Even their new contemporary Canadian art gallery lacks representative realist works.

Nevertheless, Danby graciously hosted swarms of fans and passersby for over three hours on Sunday afternoon and claimed to be unconcerned about the gallery's neglect of his work. Obviously the book's inherent weakness rests in the difference between the silent devotion to art in Danby and the torch-waving Duval who would have seen the event at the AGO as a fifth column tour de force.

It's no small secret that realism in contemporary Canadian art has been the butt of scorn since the late 50's. Abstractionists such as Harold Town of "The Painters Eleven" have categorically waged war against the placidity and comfortable nature of representational art with a special twist of the knife at Ken Danby. But, as Danby explained to me, the only thing comfortable for him in his art is the egg tempera medium which he uses almost exclusively. As for the painting itself he says, "I have to get into it, wrestle with it and become part of it".

Ken Danby stands alone. He isolates both his subject and himself from the maelstrom of political 'angry' art. He claims his work adheres to no particular trends or schools, not even the high-realism of Colville, Tom Forrestall, Hugh Mackenzie, D.P. Brown, Jeremy Smith or Christiane Pflug. Although he admits to have broadened his technique through studying the great American realist, Andrew Wyeth, he was, ironically enough, taught by a member of The Painters Eleven at the Ontario College of Art, Jock Macdonald. We might well say that the difference between a Tom Forrestall painting and a Danby is too insignificant to mention. But the unique glory of each painting is something that we can barely appreciate — the stroke by stroke process of re-creation.

As I spoke to Danby in the AGO lobby, it was hard not to consider the painting of Pancho on the cover of the book as a self-portrait. Juxtaposed, the artist and the subject are identical. In truth, Pancho is a Spanish-born neighbour to the Danby studio at Armstrong Mill, northeast of Guelph. However, Danby worked 84 hours a week for four months to create this painting and in a sense the artist pervades it. The painting's rain-drenched Pancho stands wearing a yellow rubber poncho and squinting through the smoke rising from his cigarette. He is solidly well-built but Danby elaborates the volume by intricately detailing each rain drop and the wisps of smoke around him. In my opinion Pancho is Danby's most brilliant work. But for the artist his most major work is "always the one I'm about to do".

Ken Danby, at age 37, has a wife and three children who recur a bit too often in his pieces. However, his love of hockey (and he still plays), is responsible for a series of extremely popular paintings. Lacing Up, The Skates, The Goalie, and At the Crease all evolved from Danby's realization that sport and art involve similar processes. Lacing Up was born when Danby was putting on his own skates and discovered the unique way in which hockey equipment transforms the player. Layers of padding, like layers of egg tempera create volume. And, if I may offer a surface comment, Danby's own athletic stature and rugged good looks strike me as the perfect stereotype of the professional hockey player. It's very difficult to match the man with the image of 'the artiste'.

Danby enjoys talking about the egg tempera technique and it's not an easy one. After gently separating the yolk from the white, he rolls the yolk in his palm till it forms white skin. By piercing this with a pin he obtains the pure yolk base which provides the luminosity and consistency of the paint. To make colours, he buys dry pigments in powder form from the States and once mixed with the egg the paint will remain fresh in the refrigerator for up to a week. The virtue of the medium is that it dries in layers which can be peeled off if he dislikes the effect. As well, egg tempera has a transparent quality which is invaluable for defining volumes.

The most telling quality in Danby during his visit to the AGO was his inexhaustible patience. After three hours of continual questioning and requests for autographs, he was still interested and interesting. This patience obviously underlies his 10-hour work day and the intricate detail in all the paintings composing his oeuvre. The book Ken Danby is a shrine to this consistency.

Dull? Repetitive? Static? These are other accusations levelled at Danby's art. Well, if the 'progressive' critics are hailing as vivid and dynamic the new artists such as abstractionist Harold Klunder, who claims to be "suicidally obsessed" when he paints and who intends to reflect the ugliness and disasters in life, I can see no logical support for their criticism. They simply prefer black to white. However, Danby restricts his vision to 'the sunny side' and would be wise to try his hand at a starker realism. His Motel which figures an unmade bed, cigarettes in the ashtray and general dinginess is perhaps a step towards a broader scope in his work. However, to fairly assess his aesthetic, we must realize that the very act of isolating an object to paint, even a disgusting or ugly object, gains an inner beauty through the precision in the artist's rendering. It is almost a limitation of the egg tempera medium — that it is so pleasing.

Despite gallery inattention, Ken Danby has gained considerable success during his ten years of heavy involvement in realist painting. The Gallery Moos features an annual show of his recent paintings and the next one opens in April, 1978. But Ken Danby by Duval is responsible for hurling Danby's works into most of the country's libraries and bookstores and stimulating renewed interest in the artist. Clarke Irwin, publishers of the edition claim that it is a success story in Canadian publishing history. Knowing that Danby has a wide following, the limited edition copies which sold for $1,000 apiece (there's one in the Rare Books library at the Robarts), have been refreshed by a reprinted edition selling for $32.50. Although not immediately accessible to the student budget, if you're a Danby fan it would certainly be worthwhile since it contains a complete catalogue of his egg temperas and colour serigraphs, all in full colour.

The story of Ken Danby illustrates some of the jobs of swimming against the tide and as Paul Duval says, he "is very much his own man".

Sunday Serenades Hart House Hits

The vocal recital consisting of one soloist and one accompanist is a fairly recent development of the concert scene. Although this form of recital has become the norm, it still takes an exceptional artist to do it effectively, one who has developed a fine technique and an individual who possesses a personality which is both delightful and expansive enough to touch and engage the listeners in the back row. Such, happily, is the case in the example of Gabrielle Lavigne who performed in the Hart House Sunday Evening Concert Series on September 25.

Miss Lavigne is a Canadian singer from Montreal, and one who is becoming an artist of "international stature". For example, the evening before the Hart House concert Miss Lavigne had sung with the Minneapolis Symphony during its 75th anniversary concert. The constant travelling is not, perhaps the best treatment for the voice, but it is the lot of those who enter the international concert realm.

Her international debut was made with the English National Opera Company (at that time Sadler's Wells) in 1972-73. She has sung numerous engagements with North American symphonies; the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven seems to be one of her staples.

Recital work such as the Hart House concert is something with which Miss Lavigne has just recently become involved. Perhaps it is her operatic training with its link to the dramatic art which makes her entirely successful in the presentation of a song. Too many singers forget that in the performance of a song they are supposedly telling a story or presenting a short vignette. Inherent in any sort of story-telling is the raconteur's communication by means of facial expression or "body language" as he portrays the emotions evoked by the narrative. A great many singers forget this aspect of musical performance; Gabrielle Lavigne does not.

Examples of this aspect of Miss Lavigne's talent were supplied in the first part of the programme. Mozart's Abendempfindung (Feelings at Evening) is an atmospheric work in which the performer must portray the feelings of one who contemplates the end of life, but is consoled by the thought that his beloved will grieve for him. This sort of thing is usually performed in an over-dramatic way, or else it is done so that it becomes rather maudlin. Miss Lavigne presented the work as an intimate and warm conversation with the beloved. Much the same mood was evoked in Mahler's Liebst du um Schönheit.

Perhaps the finest group in the first part of the concert were the songs from Gabriel Faure's L'Horizon chimérique. These songs are extremely subtle things, as is most of Faure's output. They are made or broken by the sensitivity of the artist and the rapport with his accompanist. It was in these works that Miss Lavigne demonstrated her abilities as a vocal colourist. The selection "Diane, Sélène" was quite effective because of the use of a well modulated head voice; the high pianissimi were used to good effect. It is a pity that the acoustics of the Great Hall obscured some of the most skillful detailing of which both performers were capable. Balance between accompanist Denise Masse and the singer was maintained throughout.

The reverberant hall was less of an obstacle in the second part of the programme, which was made up of operatic excerpts. In opera one can let out all the stops and devil take the reverberation. The singing here was not as enjoyable, to me at least, although the audience was extremely appreciative, and the works included — excerpts from Dido and Aeneas, Werther, La Favorita and the Marriage of Figaro — were well chosen. The "big" quality of voice inherent in opera is less appealing although necessary to overcome an orchestra and often over-zealous tenors in ensemble passages. The voice lost some of its focus in the upper registers in these excerpts, and also the finer shades of colouring of which Miss Lavigne is capable. Even so, the aria "The Birds and Beasts" from The Marriage of Figaro was the medium for a display of vocal flexibility which one found surprising in such a powerful voice.

In the end, however, it is the impression of a delightful personality which remains with me, and I can assure you that her audiences will never pine for a violin solo between groups.

SELF~INDULGENCE

Well, you sucks, we got one reply to our music quiz. Too difficult for you turkeys, eh? Well, it wasn't too tough for Rick Harrison who wins five albums for his dedicated research, and his 14 correct answers. For the rest of yous, here's the answers:

1. L'Angello Misterioso is George Harrison as he appears on the liner notes to "Badge", on the album Goodbye Cream.
2. Believe or not, David Holland plays a bizarre bass on a bluegrass album, John Hartford's Morning Bugle.
3. Bill MacCormick has played in many bands in the last few years, including Matching Mole, 801, Quiet Sun and National Health.
4. Jeremy Spencer played slide guitar on the early Fleetwood Mac albums.
5. "Octopus" was the only single released by Syd Barrett as a solo artist.
6. John McLaughlin plays with Jack Bruce, Dick Heckstall-Smith and Jon

Hiseman on Things We Like.

7. Duane Allman played slide guitar on Boz Scaggs' early classic: "Loan Me a Dime".
8. Back in the USA, by the MCS was produced by Jon Landau, who now produces Bruce Springsteen.
9. Signe Anderson was the original lead singer for the Jefferson Airplane.
10. Rick and Scott Asheton played with Iggy and the Stooges.
11. On the cover of Elvis Presley's Greatest Hits, it is noted that "50 million Elvis fans can't be wrong"; not to be outdone, Phil Ochs' fifty fans can't be wrong".
12. Both the Ventures and the Tornadoes released hit versions of Telstar.
13. The Yardbirds appear in Antonioni's Blow-Up.
14. Alexander Jodorowski was hired to film the science fiction novel Dune. Unfortunately he quickly went over his budget of 13 million dollars and alienated half a dozen film crews in the process. Three bands were scheduled to do the soundtrack, each developing a theme for the three major worlds. Those groups were Pink Floyd, Henry Cow and Magma.

15. "Flip City" is a song that Joe Hall and band play, and to which guitarist Tony Carrington wrote the lyrics, but the music is straight from the repertoire of Brian Wilson.
16. Michael LaCroix of the Dishes is featured in a Coca Cola Billboard.
17. Michael Mantler did a musical version of Samuel Beckett's The Way It is, and called it No Answer. Carla Bley played the piano.
18. A dub album is merely the same recording remixed. Burning Spear did an album called Marcus Garvey, and then did a dub album, titled, of course, Garvey's Ghost.
19. Well, it seems that three Live at Leeds albums exist. They are: the original by the Who, one by John Martyn and one by the Groundhogs.
20. No, Tony Facenda is not my brother-in-law. In 1957, Tony Facenda wrote a song that became a hit in his home town because it incorporated the names of several of the local high schools. Well, some bright capitalist got the idea to make a couple dozen of these, one for each major city in the country; so Tony recorded them and had local hits with each one.

21. The unparalleled Hoodoo Meat Bucket in Tom Robbins' Another Roadside Attraction was responsible for "The Barbie Doll's Hystereotomy".

22. During the summer, Stiv Bators and the Dead Boys did a gig at the now closed, Crash'n'Burn. Before the show, some stale buns were discovered at the rear entrance of the Royal Alexandra. Well a bun fight ensued, and one of the victims proved to be a horse-drawn carriage. Well good ol Stiv dedicated "I Got to Know" to "the cunts that threw the bread".

23. Who else but the Monkees would support the preservation of The Texas Prairie Chicken?

24. On the one and only album by The Fool appears the last known picture of Tyrone Slothrop, the dissolving protagonist of Gravity's Rainbow.

25. On "Surfer Bird", the Trashmen tell us that "Bird is the Word" conference

October 19 and 20 the Hart House Library Committee and SAC will be hosting a reunion of writers who have served time in residence at this university. Their number includes Margaret Atwood, Carol Bolt, Jack Ludwig, John Newlove, W. O. Mitchell, Joseph Skvorecky, and Adele Wiseman. Afternoon discussions will centre on the role of the arts in the university context. Tickets are free and available from the Hart House Porter's Desk from Oct. 1.

We are Arachne's cursed children
Unwisely mocking the immortal
Riding the spider's bearded back
An aimless army of ants

A modern metamorphosis!
Her silken thread has turned to stone
Discharged from its boundless belly
Is a web prepared to strangle
Its creator who swayingly
Balances upon a single strand
Oblivious to the recent past
And dreading the eventual

Our ignorance, tomorrow's burden
Of eternal damnation

'Last year the major question was: does one love or loathe the films of Lena Wertmuller? This week it is: do I go to John Cage or Iggy Pop?' Peter Chapman, The Cultural History of Hepcats

Filmgoers, being last year's folks at heart, are still able to phrase the former question, especially this week (and let's hope it's only this week). We can start tonight as we wonder why the Revue has programmed Mike Nichols' mean-spirited little bit of a film Carnal Knowledge with the divine Ms. W's Sweet Away. In a sensible world the house would be desolate, in Toronto however... Maybe everyone will stay at home. Surely the Science Centre's Nickelodeon shouldn't tempt anyone who doesn't harbour pedophilic hankers for Tatum O'Neill. The U of T Film Board (Med. Sci. Aud.) has Kubrick's Clockwork Orange for the 37th time. And don't take that nice girl who just hit town from Aylmer. The New Yorker offers The Beatles (USA) Ltd. (another collection of outtakes—this is getting as bad as Jimi Hendrix albums) and Elvis on Ed Sullivan.

Saturday: Not much better. Everyone repeats excepting the New Yorker which is previewing Coteau's Beauty and the Beast. They are planning a two week run for the film in late October so don't stampede though it's not a film to miss.

Sunday: Sunshine and balloons. If you're not at the York Cycle you can stay in the Innis Town Hall all day—cartoons at 2:00, Benjamin Christensen's bizarre Witchcraft Through The Ages at 5:00 and Bette Davis, Marilyn Munroe, and Anne Baxter in All About Eve at 8:00. On the other hand if you feel the need to reaffirm your faith in Italian cinema, the New Yorker has Fellini's Casanova and Clowns. The Art Gallery has Renoir's Boudo Sauvage and Eaux et Truffaut's Wild Child. The Revue, however, remains implacable—more Sweet Away and more than you can stand of Seven Beauties.

Monday: Encore une fois.

Tuesday: Innis offers a useful corrective to all the spouting about Weimar and the decline of the West. They've got the real thing with Reifentahl's Triumph of the Will. The Revue has folksy Amos Milkey and Nicky and Citizen's Band. The Science Centre has two of the 'flawed but fascinating' variety The Wild Party and Insertia. And there's still the decay of fine old Italian families, the corrupt and the angelic, La Grande Bouffe and The Garden of the Finzi-Contini.

Wednesday: The Revue repeats. The AGO begins its Wednesday night series of films by independent filmmakers (sadly nothing on the program is familiar to me, or to my consultants). The Science Centre sings along with the gas bombs in Oh What A Lovely War while decay on the continent outdoes itself at the New Yorker. There we may watch the West collapse while Mastroianni rides piggyback in La Dolce Vita and eats himself to death in La Grande Bouffe.

Thursday: Silent Movie and Young Frankenstein at Med. Sci. Aud. Casanova has moved over to the Science Centre to work over their mechanical dolls. The New Yorker watches The Man Who Skied Down Everest and given the motif of seemingly endless journeys they follow it with Sorcerer which features seemingly endless music by Tangerine Dream. And for finishers there's yet more decadent Europe at the Revue with La Grande Bouffe and Bunuel's evidence of senility The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie.

And by the way Free Wayne Kramer.

jazz

Hellow Jazz Fans!!!! Cafe Soho has almost caught me unawares, coming up with a comprehensive jazz program right under my nose. They feature young Toronto musicians without established reputations in after-hour slots 1:00 am - 4:30 am every Thursday to Sunday nights. Tonight presents the Peter Leach Quartet (guitar), tomorrow the Lorne Lofsky Trio (guitar), and Sunday night the Tim Cummings Quartet (guitar again). Free mention will be made in this column of all devoted fans who hold out until 4:30 am Sunday night. After hours on Thurs. Oct. 6 the Al Henderson Quartet (bass). Al has driven rhythm sections at York U. for years and is highly respected up there. Cafe Soho also holds open jam sessions Tues. and Wed. after hours, and Saturdays from 12 noon. Give this growing club all your support. $2 cover. 334 Queen W., 862-0199.

Free concert this week on campus: the Pat Labarbara Quartet (sax and clarinet), at Hart House Wed. at noon to 2:00 pm. Pat has graduated from Buddy Rich, Woody Herman and Elvin Jones—and now he's at U of T.

At Blondie's, the Rob McConnell Quintet with Ian McDougall (trombones) finishes up on Oct. 1, followed next week by the Sam Noto Quartet (trumpet) with the superb rhythm section of McFetridge, Young and Morell. Most of these artists are Boss Brass regulars.

Vibist Red Norvo ends his gig at Bourbon St. on Saturday with the Gap Mangione Trio (piano) beginning a two week stint on Monday.

The Phil Nimmons Quartet blows until Oct. 1 at George's, whereupon the Ed Bickert Trio fills in for the week. Bickert's face rivals Bernie Semensky's for taciturnity, but his playing is worth hearing. His reputation in the States is expanding, primarily on account of his recent album with the late Paul Desmond. The Inn on the Park kicks off its jazz season in the Copper Lounge with favorite Eugene Amaro on Saturday, October 1, 2:30-5:30 pm. Music every Saturday at these hours, $2 cover. Located at Leslie and Eglinton, 444-2561.

BIC's Coffee House, 11 Yorkville, continues to feature the George Botley Organ Trio from Tues. to Thurs. each week, 9 pm - midnight. 923-2943.

Doug Riley on keyboards ex-temporizes until Saturday at Yellowfingers. Next week, the Kathy Moses Quartet (flute) featuring creative pianist and saxophonist Ted Moses. After hours tonight and tomorrow presents the Carlton Vaughan Quartet with Orrille Thompson on tenor. On Sunday, the Pat Labarbara Quartet.

Remember: True jazz fans snap their fingers on the off-beats.

Modern dance artist and choreographer Kyrs Lober and her musician husband Bob Becker perform together at 15 Dance Laboratorium tonight at 8:30 p.m.

only. Lober who also teaches dance in Toronto is originally from the U.S. This is her third performance at 15 Dance Lab within a year. As there is room for 40 people, reserved tickets are a good idea. $3. 155A George Street (1 block south of Queen St. East, east of Jarvis). For info, call: 869-1589.

Not long ago we had Marian Engel (some time after Xaveria Holander but, unlike the latter, still with us) and frankly, the animal kingdom has not looked the same since. Since reading BEAR that is. And now, folks, we have a Russian classical ballet called BEAR LAKE. Beginning next Wednesday, Oct. 5, Toronto audiences will finally be able to see this marvellous work so highly acclaimed in enlightened circles. Last winter Les Ballets Trockadero (who are threatening to visit again) gave us men in tutu. Next Wed. we are promised at least 3 bourgeoisie bears dressed in same and perhaps even a fourth should prima ballerina Natasha decide to honour us with an appearance. Yes, friends, step right up and see the real, live bears.

Actually, it's all in fun: the Incredible Performing Bears of Nellie and Rustam Kaseyev. Nellie and Rustam's bears are not your ordinary circus teddies; they play football (take note Leo Cahill), put on a fashion show and besides the classical tradition, also venture to perform a collection of Russian folk dances. The bears are just one of the many exciting acts of THE MOSCOW CIRCUS. Other acts in the Moscow Circus are Ringmaster and clown Yuri Kuklachov; ballet-trained, high-wire-walker Marina Oskayeva and Tamerlan Nuzgarov and his acrobatic, daredevil horsemen.

The Moscow Circus is at Maple Leaf Gardens from Oct. 5 to 10 for 10 performances. Wed. thru Thanksgiving Monday 1:00 p.m. and 6:00 p.m. Tickets are $5.00, $6.00 and $7.00 and seats are limited in Toronto as throughout the Circus' Canadian tour to ensure a smaller but appreciative, capacity audience. Tickets available at the Gardens and most agencies including Eatons, Simpsons, the Bay and Moore's. For information call the Gardens' Box Office: 368-1641.

rock

The big news of the week: Iggy Pop returneth. Oct. 2, at the Masonic Temple, Mr. Pop and his new band will be showcasing the songs from his new album. Rumour already has it that David Bowie will be playing keyboards. And if that isn't enough to put a kink in your curlies, guess who the opening act is. The legendary Ramones. Get ready for an animal show.

If the above paragraph has left you cold, then you're probably one of those forlorn souls who still doesn't know what punk rock sounds like. In lieu of a thorough indoctrination, try and catch the Dead Boys, the Viletones and the Poles at the New Yorker on Oct. 14 and 15. That should be some concert. Tom Waits will be playing the same theatre on the 20th.

In a more sane realm, Sonny Terry and Brownie McGee are at Convocation Hall tonight. Steve Goodman will be playing the same location on the 16th.

Rod Steward is planning an additional concert for the 12th. Tickets are now on sale for that show. The Steve Miller band (also known as Boredom on the Hoof) will be playing the Gardens on the 24th.

If you're too lazy to hustle your butt off campus, SAC is presenting Abbey Road at Dr. John's (that's the U.C. Refectory) tonight at eight.

As for the clubs, tonight's your last chance to catch F.M. at the Chimney. They'll be followed by McLean and McLean. John Loveless and his Sidewalk Commandos (who?) is at Larry's. Shooter is at the Queensbury Arms, Ronny Abramson is at the Riverboat and Pockets, a new keyboard ensemble, is at Geronimo's. Ronnie Hawkins is playing the Hook and Ladder Club tonight, he's to be followed by, believe it or not, the Monkees, featuring the original Micky Dolenz and Davey Jones. Far out. The El Mocambo has Junior Walker tonight, the Dictators on the 3rd and 4th and Cheap Trick on the 4th and 5th. Godd will be at the Gasworks next week.

Sick of the Brunswick? Tired of the same old alcoholics? Why not meet some new alcoholics? Just nip over to Grossman's at Spadina below College. It has all the subtle charm of the Bruno plus the Louisiana Jolemakers, the most entertaining New Orleans-style jazz band in the city. And it's cheap.

art

To complement UNI 315, a new course on the Bloomsbury Group, there will be an exhibition of Bloomsbury Painters and their Circle on Sunday at the Art Gallery of York University - for all you decadents. If you're into Lancet and Leeches, a display of medical artifacts from the 19th century has opened at the AGO's Grange. Yes, but is it art?

Varsity Blues Face Undefeated Lancers

By HUGH STUART

At this point in time there are three football teams tied for first place in the OUAA's western division; Western, Windsor, and U of T. Barring a tie, there will be one less team at the top after Saturday's game at Varsity Stadium between the Varsity Blues and the Windsor Lancers.

Although the Lancers are undefeated this season, their record is slightly misleading because their victories have come at the hands of three of the weakest teams in the division; Waterloo, Guelph, and York. However, it would be a mistake to undersell Windsor because they are coming off of an impressive 43-3 victory over the York Yeomen and are undoubtedly a confident club.

Led by all-star quarterback Ed Skowneski, last year's edition of the Windsor team ended the season tied with the Blues. Skowneski has graduated, as have many of his teammates, but coach Gino Fracas has a solid nucleus of returnees to work with. He also has the fine Windsor area high school system to draw upon to fill his roster.

The most notable of the returnees is speedy receiver Bruce Walker who was Windsor's leading receiver and second highest scorer last year. This year he has been limited to a 12.3 yard average per catch, but past statistics indicate that he has the ability to break the long one. The replacement for Skowneski is last year's backup quarterback, Scott Mallender. Mallender is presently the third leading passer in the division behind Western's Jamie Bone and the Blues' Dan Feraday. In Steve Quigley and Jim Cimba, Windsor has a fine pair of targets to complement Walker. The Lancers have relied on the pass to move the ball this season as their unimpressive ground game has accounted for only 22 of their 49 first downs.

Although Windsor's offence got most of the publicity last year, their defence played a large part in the team's success. Ten defensive players are back this year, including division all stars Tim Maitre, Randy Essery, and Jim Lynn. Lynn was also winner of the Metras Trophy as the division's most outstanding lineman. So far this year, Windsor's defence has given up an average of less than one touchdown per game and is capable of giving Feraday and company headaches.

The key to limiting the Lancer attack will be the performance of the Blues' defensive line. There are two things that the line must do. First, it is essential that the line stops Windsor's running attack and force Mallender to the air. Secondly, the line must repeat last week's performance of forcing the quarterbacks to rush their passes by applying a strong pass rush. Even if Mallender does have enough time to spot his receivers, there is no reason to believe that the Blues' secondary is unequal to the task. The Lancers' passing attack could provide an example of what to expect from Western's aerial circus that is awaiting the Blues at the end of the season.

It is quite possible that the Blues' offence will put enough points on the board to take the pressure off the defence. Providing that the offensive line continues to give quarterback Dan Feraday the protection that he has enjoyed all season, the U of T passing attack will be more than a match for Windsor's. This attack is led by the Feraday to Kosopoulos connection, but showing the mark of a strong team, Feraday has found his secondary targets more frequently as the season has progressed. Joe Hawco will start his second game in place of Bob Hedges and is both an outside running threat and a passing threat from his halfback position. John Goodrow will again be called upon to grind out the tough yardage. In the last two games, Goodrow's pass catching abilities have been demonstrated as well as his nose for the goal line as he came up with two crucial touchdowns against Laurier and the only offensive touchdown of the McMaster game.

Providing the game is not played in rainy conditions, it should be an entertaining match as both teams sport good passing attacks. If it does rain, the edge would definitely have to go to the Blues on the strength of their stronger running game. In fact, it may be this superior ground attack that will provide the margin of victory on Saturday. Be there!

Blues practice running game for crucial game with Windsor.

Ercoli Leads Blues To Win

By PAUL ANGLIN

The University of Toronto Soccer Blues got back on the winning track Wednesday night with a 4-0 win over the University of Guelph Gryphons. The victory left the Blues with a one win, one loss record early in the 1977 season.

Before the game, Blues' coach Bob Nicol was worried about his upcoming opponent. "This team has been very good lately and has improved over last year", Nicol said in explaining his apprehension. In actual fact the Guelph team is inexperienced with only half its members having more than one year experience in intercollegiate action.

Any worries Nicol had were quickly put to rest by the fine play of Pat Ercoli. Ercoli, who scored three goals, started his scoring spree early in the game when he converted a Guelph miscue into a Toronto goal. The goalie bobbled the ball allowing Ercoli to move in for the score.

The first half ended with Toronto leading 1-0. In the second half the Blues played a more aggressive game. This was made possible by fine defensive work by people like Pat Pitters. Pitters continually stopped plays dead in their tracks before they could get going. This fine defensive work allowed the forwards to rove in the Griffin's end, while the halfbacks could move up and threaten.

Play like this led to Ercoli's second goal. With Toronto pressing, Ercoli got control of the ball deep in the Guelph end. He moved in on the goal and put a move on the goalie which left the few fans mesmerized. From there it was easy to put the ball in the vacant net.

According to coach Nicol the goal that broke the spirits of the Gryphons was the third one, scored by veteran Yannis Vassiliou. With a three goal lead the Blues opened up and pressed Guelph continually. To counter the Toronto offensive, Guelph had to play in a defensive shell, leaving only one attacker in a position to break quickly.

The Toronto offence again proved itself late in the game as Ercoli completed his hat-trick. Once again Ercoli's goal was the result of a tremendous individual effort. From deep in his own end, Ercoli worked the ball up the sidelines and in on the net. Once again he deked the goalie out of position and put the ball into the mesh.

When reflecting on his own performance after the game, Ercoli said "I owe it (his performance) to the Faculty of Physical Education." For all those watching it seemed that Ercoli's fine play was due to much skill on his part, combined with some nifty team work from the rest of the squad.

The star of the game was definitely Pat Ercoli. For any of our female readers, his number is 15 and he plays with a pair of slightly torn shorts.

The Blues travel to Petersburg for a weekend game against Trent on Sunday. Their next home game is against Queen's on Saturday, October 8. Hope to see you there.

French requirement a possibility

By LEON KING

Grade 13 French or its equivalent will be an entrance requirement to the U of T Faculty of Arts and Science by fall 1982 if the recommendations presented by the Task Force on Canadian Studies to the Academic Affairs Committee last Thursday are adopted. However, in spite of efforts by government appointee John Bassett to railroad acceptance of the task force's report through the council, it was decided to put off approval of the report until January so that departments affected in the faculty could be consulted.

The task force, headed by Professor William Saywell Principal of Innis College, was commissioned last October to assess the level of teaching and research in Canadian studies at U of T, and to make recommendations for their modification.

The French language issue sparked the greatest amount of debate. U of T president John Evans indicated he thought the ability to communicate in French was more important than a fluent reading ability, and worried that students would see French as "just another hurdle" to pass before getting into university. Professor David Hayne of the task force differed, expressing concern for students' reading ability. Professor J.M.S. Careless of the task force also argued that a lack of reading ability would cause the work of French language scholars to be largely ignored in English Canada.

"It's not the place of the university to shove national unity down students' throats," said undergraduate representative Julia Turner. Both she and Engineering Dean Bernard Etkin felt the report was politically motivated, a charge which Saywell vociferously denied. Saywell then added that since Canada is a bilingual country, a knowledge of French should be part of "every well-educated student's" background.

Chemistry professor Maurice Lister asked whether "to be educated, one has to be a humanist". He hoped, and there was general agreement from the floor, that certain departments, notably the maths and sciences could be excluded from the recommendation as well as the professional faculties on campus.

Ten forestry students arrived at mid-point of the meeting to protest the unfair practices of their administrative staff. Course weightings in the faculty were changed over the summer without consultation of the students, they said. Now fourth year forestry students are forced to take courses in Arts and Science in order to complete degree requirements, at a time when they should be specializing in their own field.

University Provost Donald Chant said nothing could be done about the changes this term. The matter would be referred to the Academic Standards Committee meeting to be held next week, he said.

The case of last year's suspension of fourth year student Stephen Fischer for cheating came up. Chant urged that the disciplinary powers of the Academic Tribunal which rules in affairs of academic discipline be increased from two years maximum suspension to permanent expulsion from U of T.

Released at the meeting was a report by lawyer O.B. Shime of the Tribunal. Shime wrote in his answer to Chant's appeal for a stricter sentencing on Fischer that "one of the components of 'enlightened punishment' is reformation and it is my view that the penalty imposed should reflect that possibility."

At the meeting he suggested the term of suspension available to the Tribunal be increased, but the power of expulsion remain solely with the Governing Council.

As a result of an appeal by Chant before the Appellate Division of the Tribunal last July, Fischer's original sentence was increased from one year's suspension to two.

Stellenbosch protest leads students on to Simcoe Hall

The campus-wide protest against the visit of two administrators from the University of Stellenbosch in South Africa is now taking shape. The Graduate Students' Union (GSU) has planned a series of activities for Thursday of this week, according to GSU Vice-President Leo Casey.

At 1 pm a film, entitled "There is no Such Crisis", will be shown free of charge in the Medical Sciences Auditorium. The film was made by a British news team which went into South Africa after the Soweto uprising last year and talked with black students and community leaders.

At 2 o'clock a "brief speech" will be made by either a student from the GSU committee organizing the protest or by a South African student. The speech will inform the participants why it is bad for a meeting with representatives from an apartheid state to take place.

A march with banners and placards will then progress from the Medical Sciences Auditorium to Simcoe Hall where a vigil, lasting approximately half an hour according to Casey, will be held.

Although the U of T meeting is being held on Wednesday, Casey said the protest was being planned for Thursday because "we have no guarantee they may not move the meeting to somewhere else" (other than Simcoe Hall). He added they also needed the extra day for preparation.

Casey said the GSU will be printing pamphlets about the protest for distribution across campus Tuesday and Wednesday. He said while everyone is urged to protest, they will be doing so as individuals rather than as campus groups.

"GSU will be endorsing the protest," said Casey, "and possibly SAC (Students' Administrative Council)." He added that while he can't estimate the number of participants, he felt that "a lot of students are concerned" including U of T faculty members.

FLASH!

Six of the seats in the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) by-election were filled by acclamation as of press time last night.

The three remaining seats are still open according to SAC president John Tuzyk. Nominations have been extended to Wednesday at 6:00 pm.

Bookstore prices on the rise

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

The Textbook Store is taking severe criticism once again this fall from students on the St. George campus. High prices are the common complaint. As well, a book costing $2.95 in September will cost $4.95 for the same edition by October.

John D. Taylor, general manager of U of T bookstores, justifies this disparity: "Some of our problems begin when the publisher increases the selling price." In many cases, older, cheaper yet identical stock is still sitting on the shelves, he explained.

"It's not us that fools around with the prices," says Peter Thomas, manager of the Textbook Store. "You can check our invoices." Thomas pointed out signs meant to indicate to the buyer cheaper books stacked at the front of the shelf. They consist of thin strips of masking tape marked with a green pen. "When we had bigger notices," said Taylor, "the place looked like a Christmas tree."

The store chooses to re-stock when supplies are low, rather than store basic course texts in their warehouses. Why? The university administration charges interest on inventory held on the shelves. Although they kept over-supply at a minimum, the store still owed the administration $79,796 on interest alone in May of 1977.

The store also owed the university $84,096 in rent and occupation charges last May. According to Jack Sword, special assistant to the President on Institutional Relations, these are merely "overhead charges."

"The Textbook Store should break even," he said. "They may be up or down a few thousand or so every year." When asked whether he was aware of the $76,771 deficit Thomas faced earlier this year, Sword admitted he had not yet examined the store's year-end statements.

Up until two years ago, U of T had a Book Users' Committee (BUC) to recommend policies to the bookstores on campus. "Five years ago the faculty had a 10 percent discount at the TBS. Neither students nor TBS staff thought this was fair," said Taylor. The BUC had the power to eliminate it. Now there are no longer such discounts.

Taylor explained why the committee dissolved: "It just disappeared, I'm afraid. In October '75, Mr. Sword thought we were looking for a scapegoat." Taylor said Sword also told Harold Bohne (Director of the U of T Press) that there was no interest in a BUC among the faculty.

"We would welcome a reactivated BUC," said Thomas. In June, the TBS handed the BUC issue over to SAC (Students' Administrative Council). SAC President John Tuzyk admits having done nothing yet with regards to re-establishing a committee. SAC V.P. David Jones says however, that the council sends letters to professors "delinquent" in submitting book lists.

Jones went on to say the U of T administration would play a vital role on the BUC.

Toike break-in: Skulers caught with pants down

Vandals have struck at the Toike Oike offices, the newspaper of the Engineering Society. Stolen goods consisted of Electric typewriter balls, a camera lens, and a bottle opener.

All the goods were returned with the exception of the typewriter balls of which only one was replaced. The stolen items were replaced in the Toike offices in an envelope. Enclosed was a letter signed "Mario's Marauders — we'll return your balls in exchange for our clock."

It is not known when the engineers discovered the loss; they were unavailable for comment.

U of T police are presently carrying out an investigation. It is not known which campus group "Mario's Marauders" represent.

Varg Sesqui reunion

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

John Evans can sing! The U of T president displayed his talent at The Varsity reunion Friday night at Hart House. In front of 250 Varsity staffers and staff alumni dating back to 1913, he shared the spotlight with Johnny Wayne and Frank Shuster.

Evans' 1949 version of "Sing A Song of Hart House," brought laughter from all as he sang about coeds "being a passing fad" and how they "should be kept out" of Hart House.

"Now, we have no more segregation on campus," he told the alumni. "Men and women come together in many fields — classes, residences, even Hart House." (This brought boos from some of the bald-headed and gray-haired males.) "With our new athletic complex," Evans continued, "boys and girls will be getting together athletically."

Evans then talked about discipline in the university. "For plagiarism, we suspend students for three years or force upon them one year's service on The Varsity."

Evans admitted he never worked for The Varsity, a fact not missed by the man who introduced him. Dr. Charles Godfrey noted that Evans was due to retire as U of T president next spring and said, "if he'd worked for The Varsity he would have developed a stick-to-it-iveness so badly needed in the country today."

However, Evans added that although he'd never worked for The Varsity, "I've been worked over by it."

He introduced the guest speakers, the famous comedy team of Wayne and Shuster, with a little comedy himself.

"These are two people long before my time, so I went to the archives to pick up some information about them. What's surprising is that they're actually graduates of the university!"

"They represent the essence of the Canadian fabric — which is a little tattered and torn at the present time."

Shuster launched a blistering attack on Evans. "You got a lot of laughs. I can't stand funny university presidents."

Wayne explained how he started working for The Varsity. "Everyone knows that going into Arts is a halfway home for people going nowhere, so we had a lot of time to make The Varsity the best damn college paper in North America."

Wayne added that he and Shuster's co-workers on The Varsity during the late 1930s "suffered a terrible fate; they all became pro journalists. One or two went to the National Film Board and were never heard of again."

The concluding speech was delivered by Jack Yocom, who graduated from U of T in 1932 and recently retired as a Gulf Oil executive. He left everyone with an inspirational thought: "A college education is okay, no matter how you turn out. I know a guy who graduated from university who's so smart he writes his stick-up notes in Latin."

After dinner, The Varsity spoke with 1913 U of T graduate Vernon Hearst. As men's sports editor in 1912, Hearst said he remembered going to McGill and Queen's to cover intercollegiate events. He added that one of his co-workers on The Varsity was the famous humourist Gregory Clark.

Varsity unshaken by atheism back in '32

By MARGARET E. HOLWAY

It's 1930-31. Thirty-odd Varsity staffers mill around the sunroom at Wymilwood. The Editor has called an all-staff meeting. Excitement is high. Nobody sits. Andrew Allen strides in. He delivers an impassioned defence of his stand for Freedom of the Press against The Powers That Be — the S.C.A., (present day SAC) the Governors of the University, Queen's Park itself (which supplements the $75-a-year-plus Arts fee and has to answer to a stunned electorate) and he invokes the unanimous support of his staff in his refusal to withdraw his editorial, which has just shockingly revealed that Atheism is being taught in the University of Toronto (cf. his later radio Stage series.)

Most of us wondered what all the fuss was about. We were very naive. Radio was young, TV unimaginative, and newspapers made little imprint on student consciousness. Andrew got our support, of course, stood fast — and received the full treatment from above. Did he ever graduate? Today, what's changed... except the students?

The Varsity office then was a little unkempt room in the UC cloisters. In that building, you needed the gown you wore even over your winter coat if you were UC, St. Mikes or Trinity. The room had a couple of tables, an assignment book, copy paper, one or two typewriters (few could type properly), the odd chair, and maybe somebody would be there when you came in. The Varsity ran four pages, sometimes six, published three days a week (not daily? I forget.) Assignments were chiefly campus events and interviews. I recall trying to make any sense at all out of the discussion at a meeting of the Philosophy Society, and interviewing indomitable True Davidson, lately of East York fame, in her upstairs Bloor St. West office.

Most fun was a few assignments to the night staff where we learned to count out and write the headlines for the stories going into tomorrow's paper. It was put together upstairs over the bookstore in the old University Press, back of the Chemistry building, and run off on the same premises. There'd be about four of us with the night editor, girls and men. Around one a.m., taking turns we'd go in two's to eat at the all-night restaurant on Spadina, and go home close to dawn. It's all a hazy, delicious memory now — but printer's ink got into the blood for good on The Varsity.

Daring era: flappers in the 1920's

By MARY MALLON
1920-23

"Thrice weekly the harried student munching the remnants of a nut bar breakfast or the rampant coed grabbing for the flapping golosh buckle — takes a few minutes — before nine o'clock to seize the printed page whereon may be read the doings of the times." Thus Torontomensis of 1923 (the annual yearbook of U of T) began its article on The Varsity adding that in the spring of 1923 The Varsity became a daily.

This was the flapper era. Women with the new and daring bobbed hair or the more timorous bouffant style, wore short skirts with little sweaters over white shirts with peter pan collars and mannish ties. The men always wore jackets, collars and ties. In the affiliated colleges gowns were worn in the halls and lecture rooms. In the winter both men and women wore black cloth golashes with rubber soles and buckles. The women left them unbuckled and flapping as they hurried to lectures, hence the name flappers.

Of the 55 members of The Varsity staff, 19 were women. There was a fall editor (Eric Druce from Forestry) and the spring editor (Tom Heaton from Medicine). The Women's Editor was Marguerite Gogo and her assistant Agnes Brown. There were also a number of associate editors, both men and and White Society, a group formed to foment school spirit and to fight apathy and the blahs, which, even as early as 1950 had begun to sweep the campus.

Picture stories of the time featured drunken revelry on Hoskin Avenue with motorcycles rushing through huge bonfires and senior students ceremoniously incinerating ancient racoon coats. These Friday night orgies were called Pep Rallies, and were designed to get us out to the Game the next afternoon.

The ritualistic knocking down of the goal posts following the victory was later ended, by making them of steel and imbedding them in concrete. I treasure still the photo of one

The way we were the Varsity in 1950

By JOHN KENNEDY
1950

Whenever I walked into The Varsity office, I got rattled. The Underwoods rattled me, the paste pots rattled me, even the enchanting smell of a newspaper office rattled me. But most of all, the people rattled me.

They were so much older and more experienced. They appeared so cool, confident, witty, and very much in control. The main difference between then and now, was the people and the way we were.

In 1947, in the flood tide of ex-service enrolment, the campus had swollen to 17,000. We recent high school graduates, with our bright, if acned, faces, were suddenly confronted in class and coffee shop and in The Varsity office with ex-soldiers (possibly killers,) just back from saving the rest of us from total destruction.

These guys had lived and certainly loved. They drank hard liquor, swore a lot and shared a fantastic camaraderie. They tolerated us but mixed that toleration with some disdain and condescension.

When such characters took control of seminars and news desks, life was enriched and more challenging for us kids. The DVA guys brought a sense of purpose and direction, a seriousness that was instructive for would-be-journalists.

The paper itself was the same format, anywhere from eight to 16 pages depending on the voracity of SAC advertising revenue needs. But it was a daily paper. The Mop and Pail was referred to as the "other" morning paper.

A lot of ink was given to the Blue

Today's incisive comment comes from Johnny Wayne:

"Everyone knows that going into Arts is a halfway home for people going nowhere."

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to: The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

JOBS NOT CONSCRIPTION

It's good to know that Defence Minister Barney Danson cares about the future of Canada's youth. The unemployed youth in Quebec must feel even more secure about their future now that they know that if Danson's conscription plan won't cover them that of Social Affairs Minister Denis Lazure will.

"It's heartbreaking," said Danson last week, "to see talented, intelligent kids without challenges to exploit." So heartbreaking in fact that uncle Barney has taken it upon himself to find a solution for us poor kids.

The solution: "Military service for all fit young Canadians would ensure the future strength of the armed forces and would provide Canada's youth with 'challenges' and opportunities they lack in today's society."

Well, there's no debating that we lack challenge and opportunity these days. Getting a job in the middle of an economic crisis is certainly more than a challenge. Some would say it is an impossibility. As for "opportunity", the world will likely fall into disuse before long.

By why is the situation in Canada so desperate in the first place? And what kind of opportunities can compulsory national service offer Canadian youth?

If we are to believe Trudeau the present economic crisis is the result of people living beyond their means. Since in Canada the "means" are largely owned by a few American investors and their Canadian friends and since the rest of us have to live on the crumbs that fall from the table, Trudeau's explanation may well be correct. Most of us are forced to live beyond our means. Students who have accumulated a few thousand dollars debt over the past few years know this all too well.

But then Trudeau's government is responsible for this. From the Syncrude swindle to the recently exposed uranium cartel scandal, the Federal government has shown itself adept at draining Canada's resources but inept at creating jobs and controlling prices. In effect the government has persistently protected the very processes that led to the current crisis.

From the government's point of view, of course, the scheme is extremely attractive. Not only would compulsory national service absorb the unemployed but it would also serve to create a force large enough to deal with any civil disorder that the crisis might give rise to. Right now people are apt to kill themselves when they can't find work, a practice that seems to have caught on in Cape Breton. If people really get fed up however they might turn their wrath away from themselves and direct it towards the authorities. When that happens the government wants to be prepared. The answer, brilliant in its simplicity, is to have the economic crisis provide its own policemen.

On top of this there is the problem of Quebec. There are rumblings that if Quebec tries to separate from the rest of Canada Ottawa will send in the army. Quebec, predictably enough, wants its own army. True, Lazure insists that what he wants is compulsory civic service not military service but the difference between the two is only one of degree. In an emergency it would not take much to convert a disciplined band of civilians into a disciplined band of armed civilians.

So what are the challenges and opportunities that the Danson and Lazure schemes offer young Canadians?

Well for one thing the young conscripts will have the opportunity to learn how to be submissive to their superiors. "Talented, intelligent kids" will learn to obey rules no matter how silly they may seem. Most important of all, they will learn to let others think for them.

As well the young recruits will be helped to reach maturity by being trained to arrest and shoot their civilian fellows if and when the situation arises, as it did in October 1971.

When that happens those who at present are heartbroken about the fate of young Canadians will sit back and congratulate themselves on the good job they have done.

U of T Library service inferior to that at York; Cutbacks are not the only reason, says reader

Library service has once again been cut back. A comparison of U of T library service with that of the other Toronto university suggests to me that students — especially Social Science and Humanities undergraduates — should not simply accept the justifications offered by the administrators and accept the earlier closing times of an already inferior library system.

The Sigmund Samuel library is supposedly the one that caters to undergraduate students. The typical need of the undergrad is one of access to copies of the textbooks stipulated as required reading. If this should prove to be impossible, the undergrad should be partially satisfied with a good reserve collection. Sigmund Samuel fails miserably on both counts: whereas York students have a moderately good chance of locating popular texts in the stacks, Sig Sam students have virtually none. York University sets aside an entirely separate floor for reserves; Sig Sam has a single desk with two or three attendants, hidden between the Wallace Room and the circulation desk. York knows which books are on reserve — it provides microfiche lists by author, title, course, and instructor. By contrast, at Sig Sam, there are no lists of books by author, title, etc. — in fact, there are no lists! The student must approach the reserve desk with only a guess as to whether a book may be there. (Yes, the staff have been asked to consult it to ascertain titles, I have been told that the list may not be used by students.) At York, each undergraduate course has set aside for it, for use during the entire year, an impressive array of books, often more than thirty in number. At U of T, a tutorial leader, providing ample advance notice, asked for a few specific titles to be put aside, for only a week and the staff could not handle the demand. At York, periodicals and books are regularly reshuffled, and are easily retrievable; at Sig Sam, there is virtually no chance of finding issues of popular journals — your only hope is the well-maintained College libraries. At York, circulation has long been automated; at Sig Sam, we've been promised automation for a number of years, yet it still is to be implemented. At York, there are numerous, inexpensive, and good quality photocopy machines regularly maintained; Sig Sam has fewer, poorer quality, and more expensive photocopy machines than St. Michael's College library, which serves but a fraction of the students Sig Sam is supposed to.

I can almost hear the library Administration screaming, "Cutbacks! Our hands are tied!" Not only am I tired of hearing it, the cry is a fraud. A library does not grow up overnight; it evolves. If Sig Sam is now pathetically inferior to the library facilities available to York's Social Science and Humanities undergraduates, it's because U of T administrators have paid little attention to the needs of the undergrads and/or have been incompetent, over a period of years. The current restraints have little if anything to do with the present situation. Furthermore, until a few years ago, it was York, not U of T, that was in dire financial straits. Clearly, the issue is one, not of cutbacks, but of priorities.

Let's look at the new restrictions: what is the sense in trying to "economize" by earlier closing, cutting back on the regularity with which material is reshuffled, and habitually providing inadequate photocopy? Hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of journals will be ineffectively used because the student (a) can't find the journal, because it's not been reshuffled; (b) won't have time to read the article, because it will soon be closing time and (c) so should photocopy it, but is effectively discouraged from doing even that. Where have our library Administrators' priorities disappeared?

One could argue persuasively that the library is the heart of a university, especially for the student enrolled in a liberal arts program. But let's take the point more narrowly: it is the Social Science and Humanities students who finance the rest of the University. We do not get the personalized instruction that a Faculty of Music student, who pays virtually the same tuition, requires. Neither do we, require the experimental facilities and equipment that students in the Sciences are accustomed to. The Social Science and Humanities student whose courses consist of being lectured at in huge groups in Sidney Smith amphitheatres makes only one significant demand upon the University: the library facilities. We are already burdened by a sadly inadequate, and in fact inferior, library service. Undergraduates in the Social Sciences and Humanities are already forced to spend innumerable hours of potential study time alternating between Sig Sam, Roberts and College libraries, trying to find books that are not on the shelves and have not been placed on reserve. Why should we be asked to facilitate our Administrators' already perverse set of priorities by accepting even further deterioration in our library service? The restrictions will at best save a few tens of thousands — a drop in the bucket in a University whose operating budget runs in the tens of millions — while further accelerating the already rapid decline of the quality of education at a supposedly superior University.

Lengthy opinion pieces are acceptable after consultation with the editor regarding subject matter. Opinion pieces must be typed and double-spaced on a 64 character line.

Stuart Smith ambivalent on student aid before OFS

By ROBERTA CLARE

"No matter what the system, it must not have a barrier which will discriminate against the children of the poor."

So said Stuart Smith, provincial leader of the opposition party, to members of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) at the Andorra Hotel Saturday night. His informal speech was part of the agenda of the OFS annual fall conference held last week end in Toronto.

Smith assured OFS that the Ontario Liberal Party would challenge

Minister of Colleges and Universities Harry Parrott's new student aid program "within the rules of the House."

Although Smith's intention was to speak informally on the economy, inflation and nuclear power, the student audience constantly brought the discussion back to the access of post-secondary education and Parrott's proposals.

Smith believes Parrott is taking a step in the right direction but has failed to specify levels of financial assistance. If there is a need to conserve public funds in education, Smith maintained, it should not be done by "squeezing the student" but by limiting the number of students entering university.

He suggested that courses of study should be shortened and career decisions made earlier. Moreover, he added, it is too much to expect the "working man" to subsidize students when his own children are not able to attend university. Thus, he stated, access to student aid must be equal; money should not deter a student from attending university.

Smith appeared to agree with Parrott if only on principle. The grant, Smith agrees, should come before the loan. But he added there should be more grant assistance rather than less in view of the shortage of summer jobs and the escalating cost of living. Smith also agreed with Parrott's plan to consider actual figures when assessing the income of the student rather than depending on imaginary estimated figures.

Smith opposes Parrott's three year provision for independent status to qualify for a grant. He maintained that the presently accepted two year employment record is adequate proof of the students' financial independence. The main problem, Smith said, is that the criteria for receiving loans are not always acceptable to the family or the student.

Smith seriously questioned the value of today's B.A.: "We made an error when we decided to make a university degree a ticket to a better life." Smith said four years is a "futile exercise that has no genuine meaning." Learning, he said, is a "wonderful experience" and the learning process is not to be undervalued. But a degree should not be a "screening technique used by personnel directors" since it does not show the degree of competence of the individual, Smith concluded.

Smith suggested the government provide a short-term labor subsidy to create jobs. According to Smith, it would quickly be recovered by employees' taxes and absence from the welfare rolls. Secondly, Smith believes the present apprenticeship schemes should be expanded out of the blue-collar category. An emphasis on trade and poly-technical institutions would guarantee an education with experience, he claimed. Finally, Smith maintained that individuals with training must be encouraged to start their own businesses.

Grape-pickers revive campaign in Toronto

By CHERYL APPLEBAUM

Plans to recapture the United Farm Workers' plight are now afoot on the U of T campus.

In 1975, after intensive boycotting and picketing that reduced grape consumption by 42 percent, the United Farm Workers (UFW) won a major victory with the inception of the Agriculture and Cultural Labor Relations Act in California. The Act stated workers were legally entitled to union representation in contract negotiations with California growers.

However, grape consumption has risen in the past two years, claim UFW organizers Ned Dunphy and Father John Lee. Dunphy and Lee were the speakers at an organizing meeting held at the Newman Centre last Friday for a handful of spectators.

Since Toronto is the third largest consumer of Californian produce, the UFW began their saturation campaign here on Saturday. Tactics on the campus include posters, distribution of pamphlets in high traffic areas as well as an intensive door to door campaign in the residences. The culmination of these efforts will be a noon hour meeting at the Newman Centre this Thursday.

According to Dunphy, the United Farm Workers find they cannot negotiate contracts with the growers, who have now consolidated into a unified force. This block of growers is spearheaded by Giumarra Farms, the largest operation in California.

In 1975, public pressure prompted supermarkets such as Dominion, Miracle Mart and Food City to remove non-union produce from their shelves or to label it as "non-UFW".

Iggy Pop, as quoted in Wenlock Edge and Peter Chapman's new book, The Return of the Weimar Republic.

Since I laid out these two pages by myself, I don't have to thank anyone else. However, I think apologies are in order, to everyone who wrote what appears on these two pages, because their copy had not been printed in previous issues of the Review because of lack of space and planning. Special apologies to Ann Goodstadt, whose review was lost sometime last spring, and has only recently been unearthed.

Oh and by the way, Dan Hill's favourite Fugs song is probably either "River of Shit" or "nothing".

Old roots and a new context collide

This is a review of a new play now over 140 years old. Wozzeck was left as a fragment (consisting of two drafts) by Georg Buchner who died an untimely death in his twenties, as was fashionable for artists in his era. No definitive reconstruction of the play has been made, although some are more reputable than others.

Alan Richardson has created one more, set in modern-day Toronto. His inspiration, he admits, was largely from the opera by Alban Berg, based on a reconstruction by a man named Franzos. No matter if this scholar misspelled the title (it was Woyzeck); the opera was the best argument made for the work's popularity in this century, when the world was finally ready for it.

I must be careful to separate the work by Richardson from the production by Richardson at Theatre Compact. His interpretation appears to work to several musical effects which may be part of the script (such as the use of the other players as a "chorus").

The work, although modernized, shows its genealogy clearly. With its roots in the opera, the play is forced to cope with the loss of the padding that was supplied by the music. All of a sudden, those familiar with the opera find themselves faced with a power-packed play that comes to its climax faster than it has a right to. Obviously, the play can climax anytime it likes. The objection was made — by several people in the opening-night audience — that the play was too heavy, that before the audience could brace itself, the catastrophe struck. I suppose that's what realism can do, remembering the effect of Taxi Driver in a different approach to reality.

Richardson — with a clear debt to Stoppard — appears to find a modern analogy to the expulsive-ridden symbolism of the Buchner original, an anti-romantic version of Buchner's language. The expressionistic thrust of "Man is a chasm; I'm falling" is not lost, but merely translated, in a muttered "a bottomless pit".

But can Wozzeck work in modern day Toronto you may be moved to ask? Yes and no. This play works on its own terms, but it is no longer really Woyzeck. Any time a modernization is done, one severs limbs of organic response, simply by having made the work too specific. Wozzeck (the original) is universal, so why bother to make it too specific?

The production offers answers to that question. In the programme, there is a short blurb: "Wozzeck is the man we pass on Yonge St., the solitary figure sitting in Allan Gardens, the unemployed worker in..." etc. There is a harsh reality that this play would ask you to face, that of economics in our own time, and not a time that is remote.

So Richardson's Wozzeck does not attempt to be nearly as universal in scope as Buchner's. Instead of looking at a man's conditions, we look more closely at the man, because the conditions are, but for the grace of God, our own; we look not at determinants but at ourselves. And most importantly, I think, we find that the modern context makes the play pathetic rather than tragic. As a member of the same microcosm, I cannot see Wozzeck in such a way that he really gets the attention a tragic figure warrants; he sounds more like one of the grim stories that the Toronto Sun would call "human tragedy". They really mean "a crying shame".

James Edmond as Wozzeck did not really succeed in conveying the depth that I hope is implicit in Richardson's script. The lines seem to contain much of the same sensitivity that brings about the downfall of Buchner's protagonist. Because Wozzeck is insane, precise commentary is difficult, but Edmond's indifference is not, I suspect, because of any schism with reality, but rather part of the meaning of the script.

Linda Thorson, I ruefully admit is much more than Tara King; I should have expected more. As Wozzeck's wife Marie, Thorson carries the production on her shoulders. She accomplishes the near-impossible feat of convincing us that she has been faithful to Wozzeck, turning from him sexually, and then feeling guilty afterwards. She creates an immigrant presence that is not stereotypical, yet one that draws on certain stereotypes (is this Richardson's interpretation again?) about the coarse, sensitive, and sensual immigrant wife.

The rest of the cast is not required to be especially meaningful largely because of the script. Buchner's original, as well as Richardson's derivative surrounds Wozzeck with cardboard stereotypes, people who are so flatly insensitive that they hurt the sensitive ones around them. Particularly effective in this context were Peter Brockington (Personnel Man) and John-Peter Linton (Printer).

Richardson, as director, makes effective use of the acting space in the Bathurst St. Theatre, although the bustling business he creates — an imitation of a city, I suppose — gets in the way of a script that is often beautiful enough to attract attention away from the action.

For those of you who need something to induce a primal scream, this play might be just the thing; it's heavy and intensely emotional. But then again the worst shock may be hearing from the rest of the audience afterwards about how depressing it all is.

We certainly are.

McIntyre is no hermaphrodite;

Brush Off: Two Ships Colliding in the Night, presented by Homemade Theatre and staged by Phil Savath at the Tarragon, Sept. 20-25, was more a sampling of a dramatic exercise in progress, solely for the benefit of the performer, than the presentation of a polished piece ready for audience appreciation.

The piece, written, directed and performed by Jo Ann McIntyre, examined male and female insecurities and attitudes towards a first encounter and night together. The two viewpoints were separately revealed in the characters of Bobby and Donna. Both roles were performed by McIntyre, and yet I cannot help but think that the piece would have been much more effective had the male role been played by a man. In her attempt to present Bobby as a real person she placed a heavy emphasis on superficial mannerisms and idiosyncrasies making him seem ludicrous and unreal. Her characterization failed to come alive and the audience was constantly aware of the woman play-acting the man.

McIntyre's portrayal of Donna was more believable, but here too the character sometimes lost its plausibility as the actress overplayed, falling into artificial theatrics to get the desired laughs. As an accomplished performer she failed to bring her play to life because she insisted on play-acting as opposed to being the characters on stage.

Though the piece was somewhat entertaining and at times humorous, it lacked the necessary satirical bite which would have prevented the material and performance from merely being incidental. Too often, we solemnly puff away all the fun in life, ignoring our native responses. McIntyre made an attempt to show this as she presented just one aspect of society and its people.

The chief delights in Brush Off, lay in bits and pieces of McIntyre's performance. Unfortunately, what could have been a humorous satirical comment on the games people play, became just another show.

Arabic music a rare treat in T.O.

The Arabic Traditional Music Ensemble performed Sept. 15 evening in an atmosphere of informality and good humour to an audience of over 100 people in the Hart House Debates Room.

A Toronto-based trio of Arab-Canadian musicians, Harry Ansara, Ibrahim Eleish, and George Sawa, the Ensemble has appeared previously at Hart House in April and July of 1975 and at the Mariposa Folk Festival during the Summer of 1974.

Formerly specializing in Arabic classical music, the Ensemble has, during the past year, expanded its repertoire to encompass Arabic folk music as well. Thursday's performance included both. The first half of the concert opened with a classical suite of songs, and continued with two purely instrumental works — a Tahmilah featuring individual improvisation, and a dance, the Longa, showing a blend of Arabic and Western musical styles. The more informal second half included several Egyptian folk songs and a set of improvisations for drum ensemble. The programme closed with a traditional belly dance.

The Ensemble was at its best when giving free expression to the soloistic capabilities of its members. Each performer improvised imaginatively on a surprising variety of instruments. The Arghul, an unusual Egyptian folk instrument, was heard live for what was probably the first time in Canada during this concert.

As a group the Ensemble sounds well in straightforward presentation of the songs, though they occasionally seemed uncertain during transitions in meter or style. Less successful, although still interesting as an example of folk music practice, was an unaccompanied Bedouin wedding song chanted on a monotone. These were however minor lapses which hardly seemed to matter.

The music itself is irresistible — a seemingly endless succession of attractive melodies and infectious rhythms. Since it is still almost impossible to hear this music in live performance anywhere else in North America, the Arabic Traditional Music Ensemble is a special asset in Toronto musical circles.

China chips clattering all over the city centre

Factory Theatre Lab's Teacup Entertainments, is an appropriately mad-hatter-like affair. With sensitively timed unmaskings and wit, the 'dream banquet' scene manages to bind together a loose mass of scenario-strings. Whether the glue comes soon enough to save the production is another matter. Unaccountably most of Wednesday night's audience applauded throughout the performance and raved volubly once it was over.

Teacup Entertainments is concerned with fantasy Toronto-style. Its characters are drawn from a somewhat unusual cross-section of those working and perhaps living in the city's downtown core. There is an unlikely-looking accountant who sports platformed moon boots and dreams of dominating all women. He fondles a haughty commercial artist who loathes him and thinks only of attaining a powerful position with the firm. Alongside her works an unloved, unrecognized, younger, and equally neurotic artist who wonders if perhaps she should go back to Howard Johnson's. At the corner she is eyed by a newspaper hawker who for some reason fakes an Irish brogue, defends the Globe and Mail with vigour, and philosophizes in charming if incredible fashion about his customers.

These may not be characters one comes across daily or even yearly in Toronto. What makes them really inaccessible for so much of the play, however, is the inexplicably chaotic manner in which they are constantly presented. As an ice-breaking device, the frantically paced kaleidoscope of dream encounters is effective, even necessary perhaps, if we are meant to enter immediately into the desires of these characters. But how frustrating it is when sheer dramaturgical nervousness is responsible for postponing any but the most superficial engagement for so long.

When both dialogue and spotlight fail to focus on anything of substance for so many of the play's initial scenes, a great deal of momentum is pointlessly lost. One merely looks on passionlessly as one actor after another goes through the motions.

The singing was strained but exuberant. John Roby's piano playing was very nice indeed. The staging was effective, particularly in regards to the tea party scene. But Ken Gass must reshape further the material his cast has created.

Sun and Shadow, by Jean-Pierre Aumont
W.W. Norton & Co., $12.00, hardcover.

(Ed. note: Before I allow Mr. Heaviesides to continue with this piece, I must note that there is no Summary section in The Varsity, and therefore it seems that the Review is the logical place for this. However I here and now disavow any responsibility for copyright suits brought against us by W.W. Norton & Co.)

He is essentially a blagueur, a term the French use to define the irreverent, good-natured laughter of an adolescent on discovering that the adult world is made up of puppets who dangle around with an air of self-importance while somebody else pulls the strings.

— Truffaut, in his foreword.

Jean-Pierre Aumont is an actor of international stature and renown, most recently memorable as a gracefully aging continental film star in Francois Truffaut's Day for Night. His career on both stage and screen has spanned four decades; he has worked in that time for Truffaut, Jean Renoir, Cocteau, Marcel Carne and many others, and written eight plays and a volume of short stories during that same period. His career is recounted in his remarkable autobiography Sun and Shadow.

Now that I've given as brief an account of the book as possible, I am going to succumb to the one vice I am most often tempted to as a reviewer when I find myself with a truly fine book to review, and simply quote from here on in.

For the role of the Lieutenant in Castle Keep the head of the studio wanted somebody who looked exactly like Robert Redford.

"Why not Robert Redford?" suggested Sydney Pollack.

"You're crazy," answered the head of the studio. "He's all wrong for the part." (p. 252)

Every morning the school headmaster whipped us with might and main under the pretext that he knew we'd been up all night engaging in certain "forbidden practices". What those practices could be, we had not the slightest idea. But since we were being beaten for them anyway, we decided to look into the subject more carefully...

Whoever goes in search of pleasure... finds it. From then on we knew why we were being beaten. And as for the professor, well... I suspect he had discovered within himself a certain propensity for children and whips... (p. 20)

I also did Crime and Punishment. This classic was condensed — to say the least — into twenty-six minutes. I was Raskolnikov; and Raymond Burr, now famous for Perry Mason and Ironside, was Porphyre. Remember, this was a live show. You can imagine my surprise the night of the broadcast, when, just as I was about to stab the old usurer, I saw a man step before he camera, nudge me aside, and say: "You are about to witness the crime of a young student. Why is he committing this crime? Because he's nervous. And why is he nervous? Because he doesn't smoke Chesterfields!"

Then I was pushed back in front of the camera, where I went on stabbing the usurer. (p. 148)

Al Pacino and I went out together often. We understood each other well, at least outside of the theatre. On stage, I had to constantly hold myself back from strangling him. Al never said his lines without adding or deleting something, without transforming them into a slang which came to him naturally. Since he was playing a sailor-boxer, he could get away with it. I, however, was playing Casanova, whose role was written in an archaic and literal language. I couldn't permit myself the slightest deviation.

At the end of each evening I would beg Al to respect the text of the author.

"You're right. You are absolutely right."

The next day, instead of saying to me: "Nobody thinks romance is more important than me," to which I was supposed to answer, "Except possibly me," he would belch out something like: "Shit, man, romance is fucking important."

How could I answer, "Except possibly me?" (p. 282)

The two or three days between the death of Tyronne and his burial were absurdly grotesque. There was a rivalry between the cosmetician at the morgue and Tyronne's personal make-up man. These two artists were debating who would add the last touch of pink to the cheeks of the unfortunate cadaver. "I'm the one who always makes up Mr. Power," said one. "I know what he likes."

The other would answer, "Corpses present different problems than live people. I've never had the least complaint about my work." (p. 188)

These passages are fair exemplars of the wit and warmth of Aumont's book, to which I can pay no higher tribute than to say that when one is done reading, one thinks of the author by the name of affection which he is called by his friends throughout the text — Jean-Pierre. To Jean-Pierre I give my thanks for a memorable book. If John Gardner in The Life and Times of Chaucer sometimes reduced the complex humanity of that poet and his age to the trivial recountings and speculations of gossip, Aumont manages in his autobiography to turn the materials of the gossip columnist into something much more with his warm and quietly witty style.

His book is insightful in such an unassuming way that it is possible to read him with vast enjoyment and not realize until long afterward how much he has revealed about the life of an actor, and how much of life is like an act played out before the footlights or the camera — a dull enough perception when stated baldly, but not when embodied in a work as wonderful as this.

And what incredible stories he tells! Do you know the one about the conductor on the production of Gigi who burst out in exasperation at a female cellist in his orchestra: "You have between your legs something which could give pleasure to thousands. Why do you do nothing but scratch it?"

Gays too made in Skinner box

The Homosexual Matrix
by C.A. Tripp, Ph.D.
$2.50 paper, 304 pp. Signet

Nearly thirty years have passed since the Kinsey Report showed that over fifty out of a hundred American men admitted to some sexual attraction toward other males. Thirty-seven percent of the five thousand men interviewed had actual homosexual experience, and four percent were entirely homosexual, i.e. one man in every twenty-five. Yet we still ask ourselves the question that is central to Dr. Tripp's book:

By what manner of individual psychology does a person in our society become predominantly or entirely homosexual? — is something the matter with his background, with his personality, with both, or with neither?

Dr. Tripp's answer is undoubtedly "with neither". To believe that something is "the matter" with homosexuals is to accept a teleological view of the universe in which we are "meant" to be a certain way and sex is "designed" for reproduction. As a sex researcher in the Kinsey tradition, Dr. Tripp looks at homosexuality from a scientific point of view. His book is the culmination of ten years' study, and a synthesis of information from biology, history, religion and the social sciences.

Particularly refreshing is his rejection of the "dominant mother" myth:

With or without that weak father at her side, she was first credited with causing most male homosexuality. Later, she was implicated as well in the origins of schizophrenia. After that, she was cited as largely responsible for alcoholism, and soon she was named as a major cause of drug addiction. Still later it was "discovered" that her loud ways interfere with the appetite of young children, causing underweight — or else that she tends to force-feed her offspring and thus is responsible for overweight as well. In fact, in the study of not a single negatively defined behaviour has she been found either absent or innocent. Apparently she is a hazard to success as well. A recent study of medical students "found" that not only dropouts but unhappy adults as a group had "mother mothers". Thus the whole issue has become ridiculous on its surface; underneath, it is a technical monstrosity.

Dr. Tripp is adamant that homosexuality is not caused by a damaged or blocked heterosexuality or a fear of women: "all sexual attractions are based on positive motives." Neither is it due to an inferiority complex or a lack of male hormones.

So what does cause it? Tripp sees its development as a complex and subtle process of conditioning in each individual case, but in itself the same psychological process that makes other people predominantly heterosexual. There is no basic difference between gay and straight in the way people form sexual preferences: we each find some experiences more rewarding and repeatable than others, depending largely on the way other people treat us and the chance experiences life happens to throw our way.

Dr. Tripp's contribution lies largely in making available to the general public the data he has patiently gathered from the research of other social scientists.

There are, to my mind, gaps in the book. Kinsey said in 1948: "The world is not to be divided into sheep and goats," but Tripp does not say much about the vast overlap between gay and straight, apart from admitting that some people develop two sexual value-systems and become bi-sexual.

Lesbians will be disappointed if they think that "homosexuality" in this book means "human homosexuality". It doesn't; it means "male homosexuality", though Tripp does draw a few interesting examples from lesbians.

"The Question of Psychotherapy" is one of the most interesting chapters in the book. Psychiatrists have often tried to change their clients' sexual preferences, with notable lack of success. Tripp analyzes the techniques of Dr. Lawrence Hatterer (Changing Homosexuality in the Male) and points out that a deliberate attempt to increase a patient's guilt is without precedent in psychotherapy. Actually, Tripp and Hatterer have basically the same idea about homosexuality, i.e. that it is learnt behaviour. The difference is that Hatterer tries to replace it with heterosexual behaviour by encouraging his patients to deliberately condition themselves to respond positively to heterosexual stimuli.

Tripp hints strongly at misrepresentation in the case of Irving Bieber, author of Homosexuality: a psychoanalytic study of male homosexuals. According to Tripp, this 358-page book claims from nineteen to fifty percent "cures", but its author could not produce a single "cured" homosexual when asked to do so by Kinsey's associate Wardell Pomeroy. A few people came forward and said they could now resist "temptation", or they could have heterosexual intercourse if they fantasized about their own sex, but not one whose sexual preferences had really been changed. Over to you, readers: any volunteers?

Killing at both ends: M.D.

By KATHY GUYER

When does life begin?

This was the controversial question discussed Tuesday at Hart House by Toronto obstetrician Heather Morris. At the invitation of the U of T Pro Life group, Morris led the examination of the relationship between abortion and euthanasia.

Morris began by stating that respect for human life would have to step from today's generation, as previous ones had ignored it.

She gave a slideshow and a brief description of the development process to prove that human life begins immediately after conception. The advocates of abortion evade this, said Moarris, by claiming that social and personal characteristics must be developed before a fetus can be considered a human life.

In comparing abortion with euthanasia, Morris stated they both killed the innocent to solve problems. There were practices against all existing legal, moral and medical codes. The major difference was that they occurred at the opposite ends of the life cycle, argued Morris.

The reasons for carrying out an abortion were considered "invalid" by Morris. The case of a mother whose health is in danger from her pregnancy no longer holds because of advanced medical technology; she claimed. She felt that the possibility of a defective child was an unsuitable reason for abortion. She called this "fetal euthanasia."

Morris claimed the majority of pro abortionists also support euthanasia. She charged that the media had a "great deal" to do with the change in attitude towards euthanasia. Their promotion of "death with dignity" causes various problems as the concept is ambiguous, said Morris. She said that because every case of abortion or euthanasia must be handled on an individual basis, effective legislation is impossible.

of our most distinguished Ottawa figures, monumentally drunk, diving off the south goal post following a win over Western.

On the political front, Communism had yet to be confronted although there was some concern on campus that the visit of the Red Dean of Canterbury might somehow endanger our malleable minds. A left wing paper was founded to offer an alternative to the liberalism of The Varsity. It soon folded. Still ahead was Korea, the atomic spy rings and the Rosenberg trials.

At Varsity parties we drank a lot, never heard of dope and danced in close physical contact with girls to big band sounds. The more talented jitterbugged or jived. Elvis Presley, Chubby Checker, Chuck Berry and the Twist were all ahead in the happy, grey-fannelled buttoned down days of the 50's. So was McCarthyism.

Girls were not yet women and on The Varsity occupied the women's sports desk. Male Chauvinism was rampant, particularly among the engineers, or Skulemen, as they quaintly termed themselves. The Varsity staffers, then as now, were already liberated, forward thinking and possessed of a gentle, generous and totally cultivated sensibility.

Beginning reporters in those days always handed in their copy with fear and trepidation, and fled before an editor could read it. The next morning they nervously scanned the pages looking for their insignificant little excrecence. Would it be in? Would it be changed? And joy of joys... would there be a by-line?

At least that facet of The Varsity life hasn't changed.

Everything from Quebec separatism to classical literature was discussed last Wednesday at Hart House by Professor Northrop Frye in an informal colloquy with students. A day and night long agenda of activities was planned for the Hart House contribution to Sesquicentennial celebrations. The audience of approximately 40 listened intently and at times, with amusement, as Frye (who retires at the year's end) proffered opinions on the image Toronto has gained since the days when the city was known as "hog town". Frye was presented with a book containing reproductions of paintings held in the Hart House collection.

Critic gets yuks for Unity

By ALAN STEWART

Dennis Braithwaite, television critic for the Star, kicked off a Hart House debate Wednesday night with the statement that the federal government's refusal to challenge Quebec's Bill 101 makes him question Prime Minister Trudeau's commitment to national unity.

Bill 101 establishes French as the official language in Quebec.

Speaking before a crowd of about 90, Braithwaite argued against the resolution that "the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) should serve as an instrument for National Unity." He won the debate. Braithwaite declared there was already a strong consensus in English Canada for National Unity.

The real problem he said, is that the size of the Quebec bloc in the House of Commons is an "irresistible temptation for politicians to pander to Quebec in order to be elected."

Braithwaite felt this problem could be solved by giving each province an equal number of MPs, although he admitted there was no chance of this reform ever happening.

The controversial columnist provoked laughter by noting that he had been knocking the CBC professionally for many years and that "it pays pretty well." "I find it very hard to be serious about the CBC," noted Braithwaite. "I don't know what it is; I don't know what it's trying to do." But if the CBC is good at anything, according to Braithwaite, it is successful at "frustrating any attempts at meddling or political interference."

Braithwaite doubted the Federal Liberals would ever take a strong stand against Quebec's language bill because of their dependence on Quebec for a large proportion of their seats.

"Pierre Trudeau is in his own way as big a separatist as Rene Levesque," he said.

Before Braithwaite's address, four speakers "on the paper" and many more speaking "from the floor" traded pot shots at one another in the interest of the greater national good. Peter Neilson and David McLoughlin, speaking for the "Ayes," argued that CBC should reflect the prevailing consensus among Canadians. Even a free press, declared McLoughlin, comes second to national unity.

Geoffrey Buerger and Ian Henderson replied that the CBC was manifestly unable to turn a multicultural country into one united nation and that recent CBC-baiting approached dangerously near to challenging freedom of thought and of speech. If that climate were to continue, suggested Henderson, then "perhaps the CBC could hold its own McCarthy hearings and air them itself."

The prevailing "slightly foolish" tone of many speeches was praised by Braithwaite as an entirely appropriate point-of-view to take concerning any CBC projects.

CAREERS IN BUSINESS MANAGEMENT

Back to school. Exams. Christmas. More classes, more exams and graduation. And next...

Right now you are probably thinking about the past several years and what you have to look forward to after graduation.

While you're at it, consider the personal growth and satisfactions you could experience at Procter & Gamble — a leader in the consumer products industry. We regard training and development as our most basic responsibility because we promote strictly from within Procter & Gamble. We know of no way to train people to become managers other than to have them learn by doing.

Economics, history, psychology — our managers include diverse backgrounds. More important than your specific field of study are such basics as intelligence, leadership ability, innovativeness, and a solid track record of achievement.

Prior to on-campus interviews, representatives from Marketing, Finance, and Sales will be visiting your campus to answer questions and talk about their experiences at Procter & Gamble. Specific date, place and time will be advertised soon in this newspaper and at your placement office. The visit will be a one-day informal session in which all interested students can learn more about career opportunities in business management at Procter & Gamble.

As a first step, we invite you to visit your placement office and obtain a copy of our literature. Additional information is also available in the library file in the placement office.

Plan to be at our pre-recruiting session — no appointment necessary, drop in any time.

women in charge of various departments. The women never entered The Varsity office at Hart House. Staff meetings with the men and other business were conducted in a cheerless room in the basement at the western end of University College.

Twice a year the women were allowed to "put the paper to bed" in the press room back of the Sir Sanford Fleming Building. Since this entailed staying up all night, the women were chaperoned by Miss Marie Parkes, a graduate student who was secretary of the student council. In getting out the paper, newcomers were initiated into the odd headlines compressed to fit space, and other mysteries of the trade including proof-reading, copy reading, make up and a thousand and one other things.

Women had recently obtained the vote as a result of their work in the First World War and were quite conscious of their rights. In 1922, the Women's Press Club was founded. Its pin of gold and seed pearls was in the form of an open book superimposed upon a student lamp. An American journalistic fraternity invited the members to form one of its chapters, but the invitation was refused on the ground that such organizations were "rather undemocratic."

One case of being called on the carpet involved the 1923 initiation of the School of Practical Science. Enterprising Freshmen seized and occupied the old gym where the initiation was to take place and were forced out by gas poured through openings in the roof. A tragedy almost ensued. The daily papers and The Varsity were censorious, calling for an end to all such proceedings. The Varsity staff, on complaint of the Engineers, was called before the Executive Committee of the Student Council to explain its sensational reporting. Since some of the staff were also on the Student Council Committee, The Varsity had support and a motion of censure was lost.

As a background to all this, Toronto was entering a period of prosperity. Students were made aware of international affairs; the League of Nations, the Disarmament Conferences, conferences on the payment of war debts, and the ominous rise of Fascism in Italy, forerunners of the Great Depression and the Second World War which shaped their lives as graduates. Likely, their training at the university and on the Varsity helped them to survive.

Blues Romp To Big Win Over Windsor

By HOWARD DEANNE
and KEN WHITEHURST

The Varsity Blues slogged to a 29-7 victory over the Windsor Lancers, in a football game played Saturday at Varsity Stadium. The game was played in cold, driving rain and on a soaking wet field.

The Blues' offensive line blasted the Lancers' defensive team off the field time and time again, leading the Blues to 389 yards of total offense. Two hundred and fifty six yards were gained on the ground and 133 yards in the air.

Spearheading the attack was Varsity running back John Goodrow, who smashed out 186 yards running, caught two passes for 30 yards and scored two touchdowns.

Goodrow said that it was nice playing in the mud, because "it doesn't hurt as much, and the only thing you have to worry about is drowning."

It was a good thing that Goodrow liked the mud because he carried the ball on 21 of Blues' 43 running plays. "I'll carry the ball all day — I don't mind the work at all, and besides, it's nice to see Steele, Mac, Sokovnin and Tim and Simon all in front of you just movin' 'em down."

Varsity quarterback turned running back Joe Hawco was the number two ground gainer carrying the ball 13 times for 65 yards and one touchdown.

The Lancers had hoped they could pass against the Blues, but between the rain and Eugene Nakatsu, it was not to be.

In the third quarter, Nakatsu intercepted a pass by Lancers' quarterback Scott Mallender and broke many tackles on his way to a 30 yard return to set up the Blues' third touchdown.

"I've been waiting for that one," Nakatsu quietly said after the game. He, with the rest of the Blues' defensive backfield, limited the Lancers passing game all day long.

Linebacker John Brown, defensive back Bruce Pollock and linebacker Mike Mastragostino each intercepted a Lancers' pass.

Varsity quarterback Dan Feraday attempted 18 and completed 9 passes. He had two passes intercepted. As usual his favorite receiver was Chris Kotsopolous, who caught 4 passes for 71 yards.

Gino Cundari and John Goodrow caught two passes each for 23 and 30 yards respectively. Dan Dominico caught one pass for 10 yards.

Windsor scored first when Joe Hawco conceded a point in the end-zone after an unsuccessful Windsor field goal attempt.

The Blues scored their first points halfway through the second quarter on an impressive 37 yard run by John Goodrow. Preceding this play, Goodrow ran four successive plays for 31 yards. The point-after attempt was good, and the Blues took a 7-1 lead.

Goodrow's 70 yard run late in the first half set up the Blues' next touchdown. He explained that "it was Joe Hawco's blocking that sprung me for the long one." Hawco elaborated, "The key to the play was to knock the corner down. I found their corner kind of weak. The corner was coming fast which makes the job easier for me because he comes to me and I take him — he kept committing himself too early."

The Varsity — Alex Sochanowsky

Goodrow was almost unstoppable as he carried 21 times for 186 yards.

Dan Feraday completed the drive and scored the touchdown on a one yard keeper. Varsity went into the locker room at halftime with a 14-1 lead.

Halfway into the third quarter, Eugene Nakatsu's interception set up a 10 yard touchdown run by John Goodrow, which put Toronto ahead 20-1.

Mike Sokovnin's convert was good and his kickoff was conceded by Windsor in the end-zone, which gave the Blues a 22-1 lead.

Early in the fourth quarter, former back-up quarterback Joe Hawco showed his running ability. On a five play drive, he ran three times and ended by running 5 yards around the end for a touchdown. As usual, Sokovnin's extra point attempt was good.

Windsor's only touchdown came after Lancers' defensive end Chris Kolonelos picked off a Feraday pass mid-way through the fourth quarter and ran the ball to the Varsity 4 yard line. Lancer fullback Craig Mallender took the ball across for the only Windsor touchdown.

They tried for two extra points, but were stopped from scoring by a strong Blues' rush. There was no further scoring and the Blues won 29-7.

Toronto's hottest, wettest, but least supported team will play the Guelph Gryphons this Friday night in Guelph. Their next home game will be homecoming, Saturday, October 15, when they play the York Yeomen.

Rugger Blues Defeat McMaster

By HUGH STUART

In view of the fact that the Varsity Rugger Blues had routed RMC 42-0 two weeks earlier, it was expected that the Blues would chalk up a relatively easy victory at McMaster on Saturday. For a while the Blues lived up to expectations manufacturing a comfortable ten point lead by half time. But it took a try by Charlie Singer with ten minutes left in the game to ensure the Blues of their 25-13 victory over McMaster, the referee, and the weather.

The Blues got off to a fast start when Bob Smyth ran the ball across from a scrum at the McMaster five yard line. Doug Brent missed the convert but added a field goal minutes later to give U of T a 7-0 lead. Then the Marauders made a costly error when one of their backs fumbled the ball near midfield. Derek Colaco capitalized on the miscue, kicking the loose ball into the McMaster end zone and falling on it. Brent's convert was good. With the score 13-0 McMaster finally got on the scoreboard with a long field goal. Both teams added three more points on field goals before the half ended.

The second half scoring started as quickly as the first when Brent nailed a 20 yard field goal. Then the tide turned in the home team's favor when they stopped the Blues from scoring after three scrums at the McMaster five yard line.

The Marauder stand seemed to inspire the referee too, as he became whistle happy calling penalties that directly contributed to three consecutive McMaster field goals, closing the score to 19-15.

All of the credit for the McMaster surge cannot be accredited to the referee because for two thirds of the second half the Blues lost their drive and sagged. With a 19-6 lead against a weaker team like McMaster a sag might be excusable, but against a strong contender such as Western or Waterloo a similar lapse could cost them the game.

With the heat on the Blues counterattacked, moving the ball to the Marauder two yard line, where Charlie Singer drove across for the four pointer, breaking his nose in the process. The rest of the game's scoring came from the legs of the two kickers as Brent converted Singer's try and the McMaster kicker scored his sixth field goal of the game.

The Blues' margin of victory resulted from strong performances from three positions on the team. At scrum half, Gord Kerr's ability to accurately pass the greasy ball placed him in a class far above that of his McMaster counterpart. Although George Gorzynski had a bit more trouble in handling the ball than Kerr, he continued the domination of the line outs that he had established two weeks ago against RMC.

Last, and definitely not least was the play of the Blues' front row (the football equivalent would be the offensive and defensive lines; the pit) of Kris Kirkwood, Enzo Federico, and Singer whose power in the scrums gave the blues possession countless times.

Although these individuals stood out, the win resulted from a total team effort. For most of the first half, and occasionally in the second, the team executed the rucks, mauls, and wheels as well as coach Neil Sorbie could ask of them.

By some act of Providence, the rain subsided for the Firsts' game but the Seconds did not escape so lucky, losing in a downpour, 12-0. The Seconds had the ability to beat McMaster but failed to execute their game plan. Sorbie will have to keep his eye on Steve Patterson and Mayland McKim after their performances on Saturday as the Seconds continue to send up strong players to the Firsts. The best example of this is Doug Brent whose promotion from the Seconds solved the First team's kicking problems.

The Third Half: Due to a schedule change, this Wednesday the Blues are going crosstown to face the defending OUAA champ York Yeoman. Game starts at 4 p.m. Support would be appreciated. It looks like Waterloo and Western will be the teams to beat as Waterloo has beaten Western and Queen's, and Western has beaten York.

Good Coaching Pays Off

By JIM O'LEARY

With their impressive victory over Windsor, the football blues passed the mid-point of their season undefeated. Such a feat naturally lends itself to conjecture on the part of fans and media as to what it was that contributed most to attaining such a record.

Many will undoubtedly point to factors such as the fine play of the offensive line, the passing of Feraday, the catching of Kotsopolous, the running of Goodrow or the tough play of the defence. Ultimately though, it is the coaching staff who must receive most of the credit for the fine showing to date and the optimistic outlook for the rest of the season.

The sign of a good coaching staff is one that is able to evaluate personnel, and organize their team to get the most of the talent available. The sign of a great coaching staff is one which can make mid-season adjustments and re-evaluations when their original plans have gone awry due to injuries, or any one of a number of other factors.

If there was a turning point in the Blues' season thus far, it had to be their unimpressive victory over Laurier. Toronto's narrow victory showed the Blues' coaches that changes were needed if their team was to have a realistic chance of making it to the college bowl. First of all Laurier's wishbone offence showed weaknesses in the Blues' defence against the rush. Also, after the injury to Bob Hedges, the Blues' running game was ground to a halt.

The defensive problem was relatively simple to correct. Instead of using a nose guard, which they had employed against Laurier, Toronto reverted to a simple four-four defence. This defence is particularly effective against the rush as can be seen from the results of Toronto's last two games. McMaster was limited to only 59 yards along the ground while Windsor managed only 84 yards.

The correction of the offensive problem was a much more complicated matter. The coaches had to find a way to get John Goodrow the running from he had enjoyed in the first game of the season against Waterloo.

Through a clever re-evaluation of their personnel the coaching staff found the answer to their problem lay in shifting certain players to different positions.

The most noticeable of these changes was the insertion of back-up quarterback, Joe Hawco at running back. The other changes saw Sam Sinopoli move to slotback and tackle Mike Sokovnin move in to the vacant tight end position.

Against McMaster, this offensive alignment managed to grind out 189 yards rushing under miserable conditions. With two weeks of practice under their belts the offence bettered their output with a remarkable 256 yards rushing against Windsor. Throughout the Windsor game the blocking of Hawco, Sokovnin and Sinopoli continued to throw key blocks to send Goodrow on his way to a 186-yard day.

As the Blues look ahead to the second half of the season and their ultimate showdown with Western for the conference championship, there is no reason to doubt that they will continue to improve. The coaches have the players believing in themselves and looking forward to completing the season undefeated.

Golf Team Upset In Semi Finals

by JIM O'LEARY

The University of Toronto golf team had their season come to an early finish when they were eliminated in the semi-finals of OUAA competition on Saturday. Playing under poor conditions they placed sixth in the tourney. The top five teams advance to the finals next weekend.

The Toronto team had entered as one of the pre-tournament favourites to qualify for the finals due to their showing both last year and this autumn. Last year the team went to the final and narrowly missed winning the championship, having to settle for second place. At the St. Clair Invitational on September 20, the team finished a solid second in a strong showing.

Captain Rolie Hamar felt this year's team was stronger than the team that came in second last year. In describing their loss Hamar said "it was very disappointing. I know we had a better team (this year) than we did last year."

Hamar was critical of the conditions of the course. The constant rain of the past few weeks made the course tough. Hamar felt the organizers of the tournament made the course even tougher by their "unfair" pin placements. In some cases, Hamar reports, "the pins were on the sides of hills and in other ridiculous positions." As a result, the tournament did not represent "a fair test of a golf" in Hamar's view.

The other members of the team are Dave Deasely (who shot rounds of 70, 72), Geoff Bustin (68, 80), John Bays (70, 75), and Bruce James (77, 75). Hamar shot 74 on both his rounds.

Although Toronto's golf team does not have a shot at the OUAA title, their season may not be over. If enough funds can be found, the team may be travelling to Florida to compete in the Miami Beach Invitational on October 16-18.

Two years ago a U of T team finished sixth of 16 teams in this tournament. This is a remarkable achievement when you consider that they were competing against some of the top university golfers in the United States. Of all the golfers in the tourney, the U of T team had the only players not on golf scholarships.

Last year U of T did not send a team to Florida. Hopefully, this year, money will be found to allow our team to carry the banner of U of T in Florida.

Students jeer Parrott at Seneca

By ANDREW MAHON

Colleges and Universities Minister Harry Parrott's meeting Wednesday was designed to provide answers for students and input for Harry Parrott — but after 2 hours of fiery discussion, both parties left Seneca College with more questions than answers.

About 700 students from colleges all over Ontario including Waterloo, Guelph, McMaster and York attended along with 150 students from U of T who arrived in SAC buses from the downtown campus.

Parrott and his assistants, John Bonner, senior planner of student assistance in the ministry, and Bill Clarkson, director of the student awards board of the University, were on hand to gather input for the new student assistance program.

Students in the auditorium were generally upset and angry at the new program which is to be introduced in 1978-79.

At the beginning of the meeting, the students were granted a 45 minute period to make statements and then a 30 minute question period.

Some students suggested that the Minister was purposely avoiding students by holding the meeting in such an inaccessible location. This observation led to a standing ovation.

Leo Casey, Vice-President of the U of T Graduate Students Union asked the minister why "he had adopted a policy which would make graduate and professional programs the exclusive domain of the affluent in the province". Another standing ovation met this statement.

Some students complained that the new program would effectively make higher education available only to the affluent. One student predicted that "places like the U of T will rightly be called 'ivory towers'".

John Tuzyk, U of T SAC president, confessed that he "had problems taking this series of meetings seriously, since Parrott avoided the U of T completely." But the most "bizarre" aspect of the meeting according to Tuzyk was the fact that "it's the proposals that we know nothing about which we're supposed to comment on and analyze."

Even though Tuzyk concluded that "Parrott doesn't want public input, he wants public relations." The minister was eager to discuss the problems of individual students who managed to get to a microphone, and his advisers remained for an hour after the meeting talking to students.

During the question period, Parrott explained that the budget for student assistance for 1978-79 was $76 million. He compared the total budget to a pie and asked students how it should be divided. However, Parrott pointed out: "If you give some students more, then others will get less, since the bottom line of the equation is fixed".

Parrott repeatedly asked questions of the student audience, but got few replies. "Are you saying that you'd rather have the present system than the new system," he enquired.

During his summary speech, Parrott said the plan would be finalized in three months. After answering a final series of questions from Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) researcher Chris Allnutt, Parrott remarked, "for mature people, I'm amazed that you think everything can be resolved in absolutes".

He concluded, "it's fairly obvious that you're not taking our invitation of dialogue seriously" but indicated that there might be more meetings if he felt they would be useful.

After the meeting, OFS held a press conference where Miriam Edelson, chairman of OFS, summarized Parrott's main points. Edelson said the new program is not making post-secondary education available for all students, but OFS would "continue to give input for the program."

South Africa demonstration marches on Simcoe Hall

By ROBERTA CLARE

"We oppose U of T complicity with apartheid." So chanted approximately 75 students and faculty members as they rallied and marched to Simcoe Hall yesterday.

The demonstration against the U of T visit by the two administrators from South Africa's Stellenbosch University was organized by the Committee to Stop Bank Loans to South Africa and supported by several campus and community organizations.

The rally in the Medical Science Auditorium began with a film entitled There is No Such Crisis and was followed by a forum headed by the Graduate Student Association Vice-President Leo Casey, John Saxby, a member of the committee and Anver Saloojee, a member of the African National Congress and a U of T student of political economy.

The forum reviewed the conditions that led to the black uprisings in South Africa, the oppression of blacks, who constitute 87 per cent of the population, by a white minority government and the "Internal Security Act" by which this government has attempted to stifle the black movement. "South Africa is the only country in the world that has racism legislated into the laws," Saloojee stated. "We want a South Africa that has no exploitations of race or class," he said.

The rally then proceeded to Simcoe Hall. Angered by U of T President John Evans' failure to reply to both a letter of protest and an invitation to attend the rally, students went to his office seeking an explanation of the policies that allowed the U of T to confer with the Stellenbosch officials.

Evans, however, is currently attending conferences in Charlottetown with the Task Force for National Unity. Fred Case, a U of T instructor in the Department of French, found it "contradictory and hypocritical that Evans is on Trudeau's Task Force for National Unity and yet is willing to accept people who make an ideology and morality of racism and teach it in their institutions."

In Evans' place, Professor Harry Eastman, Vice-President of Research and Planning, addressed the crowd. Eastman, in response to the "loudmouth intervention" of members of the vigil, agreed: "The university should not be used as a political instrument. The fact that we find the policies of South Africa reprehensible should have no bearing on whether the university should engage in a free exchange of knowledge," he added.

In response to attacks from the vigil that "the representatives are not here out of liberal intentions but out of fascist beliefs" Eastman replied: "It is our duty as a university to respond to genuine academic requests." He added that the rector of Stellenbosch told him Wednesday their university was considering that "their admission be non-discriminatory" in the near future.

The demonstrators expressed their concern with Stellenbosch Chancellor John Vorster's political sympathies with the Nazi regime in the second world war. The vigil accused U of T of political complicity: "The fact that U of T has invested in corporations that in turn invest in South Africa means that this university has already taken a political stance."

In response to questioning from the CITY television news crew, Eastman replied that "it is not a question of rights. It is a question of what is just. It is not for us to make judgements on the policies of the governments in which these universities reside," he added.

Joan Foley, President of Scarborough College, informed the Stellenbosch administrators of the resolution passed by the Scarborough College Council September 26 and warned them of possible demonstrations. At the request of the Stellenbosch officials, Thursday's meeting at Scarborough College was cancelled.

Decreasing enrolment causes budget deficit

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

At its first meeting last Tuesday, the Resources Subcommittee of the U of T's Governing Council approved the new budget guidelines for the upcoming fiscal year and sent them on to the Planning and Resources Committee for final adoption.

Administrative officer for the Planning and Resources Committee, Harry Eastman stated that although Queen's Park plans to give a 5.8 per cent increase in grants to colleges and universities for 1977-78, no one knows how that will be divided up between the over two dozen institutions across the province.

Eastman made it clear that one proposal would be that each academic division at the university submit budget outlines based on 97 per cent of their present budget. Furthermore, because of drops in enrolment in some areas, certain departments may end up receiving less than 97 per cent of their present budgets, he said.

It was explained that the university is in a deficit for the first time in over 50 years. The 1976-77 deficit alone equaled $1.4 million which created a $2.3 million deficit for the upcoming fiscal year. Since 80 per cent of the university's income is made up of government grants, "the 5.8 per cent increase is based only on this 80 per cent, which will shrink as a result of the costs of inflation" stated subcommittee chairman John Whitten.

The real problem as seen by the authors of the guidelines is that enrolment within the next three to five year period is on the decline, thus assuring a drop in government grants. "The university must look for other sources of income" stated Eastman.

Visa students who, as of last year, are paying more for their education here than are Canadian students, will continue to do so if the guidelines are accepted by Planning and Resources. Assistant Vice-President of Research and Planning Jerry Hebert stated that "the model we're presenting takes into account that this policy will be continued into the 1978-79 fiscal year. Otherwise, $0.5 million is at stake now and more than two million dollars will be lost by 1980-81 if the visa student fee policy is reversed".

"Since 79 per cent of the university budget goes towards salaries and related benefits, there must be a trade-off somewhere between salary increases and increases in areas such as the implementation of new programs and the purchase of new library books" stated Hebert.

Professor Stephen Triantis wondered whether or not a university should be allowed to run on a deficit. "Are we going to let people go and not hire others after retirement of faculty members?" he asked. The question, however, resolved, "It is simply a matter of contraction of the economy as a whole" said Eastman.

Student representative Brian Hill stated that "we must start with the small things. Why, for instance, did we spend $108,000 renovating a building valued at $78,000 for the ombudsman's office"? The motion to send the budget guidelines to the Planning and Resources Committee for approval was passed unanimously.

Reliable sources informed The Varsity yesterday that John Evans, U of T president, will be running for the liberal seat in the federal riding of Rosedale. Elections may be held at the end of May or early June.

Evans was out of town on unofficial business and unavailable for comment. When questioned about his candidacy his wife commented "That will be news to him."

Competition 78-4000

Women allowed in men's league

By JIMO O'LEARY

In a controversial eight to four decision the U of T Council of Athletics and Recreation voted Wednesday to allow women to compete in the interfaculty soccer league.

The vote became necessary after the Intramural office refused to allow Barb MacKay and Sheila Lewis to compete with men. To date all the games in which they have participated were forfeited to the opposition.

Committee member Bruce Kidd stated that the two girls should be allowed to compete in the men's league and that full credit be given for the games which were forfeited.

Kidd admitted that there were administrative problems making it difficult to form a separate women's league this year but felt they should not prevent the girls from playing. He felt that there were no "physiological and biological differences between the men and women," that could stop women from competing with men.

The committee failed to heed the advice of some members who wanted to study the matter more carefully before reaching a final decision. Questions such as the women's susceptibility to injury and the university's liability in the case of injury were matters which should have been explored more carefully they said.

A factor which helped Kidd in his crusade to get his motion passed was the unfavorable publicity the university received in Wednesday's edition of the Toronto Sun. Some committee members feared legal action from the Human Rights Commission.

Director of Athletics "Bud" Fraser termed it "unfortunate" that the Council rushed into a decision which he felt could have serious ramifications. Fraser felt passage of this motion was a matter of "expediency" because "some members felt pressured."

Fraser saw no reason why they could not have endured the present situation for the remainder of this year and in the meantime studied all the consequences of co-ed participation in sports.

getting Nicky around, as usual

Co-ordinator of Recreation, Dave Copp although he wasn't at the meeting, concurred with many of Fraser's opinions. He said he was sorry that the committee voted on the issue before they had all the facts. Copp said he has done studies that show women are more susceptible to injury than men and that the university could be held liable if one of the girls is injured while playing with the men.

Former professor wonders why tenure not granted

By PETER ARUVALD

In 1972, after six years with the English department at University College, Stuart Niermeier was informed that he would not be able to obtain tenure from the university. He was given instead a four year contract, at the end of which he would have to leave. Today, Niermeier is an instructor at Centennial College, and he is still wondering what happened.

After being told that he would be denied tenure, Niermeier promptly appealed the decision to the University Tenure Committee. In 1975 he received the results of his appeal in the form of a letter which simply reviewed the procedure of obtaining tenure, and informed him that his appeal for tenure was turned down. "It was extremely vague," says Niermeier. "I for one do not know why I was denied tenure."

Niermeier notes that it was highly unusual that he and others received four year contracts instead of the normal one or two years. He cites the case of a former colleague, who was for some reason given only a one year contract at the same time as he received his four years. This individual appealed it according to Niermeier, and received tenure. Why? Niermeier doesn't know.

Another former U of T faculty member, who requested that he not be identified, was also denied tenure at the same time as Niermeier. His sentiments about the vagueness of the tenure procedure are similar to Niermeier's. "Their (the tenure committee's) system of confidentiality," he says, "at best makes us aware of certain opinions that have been submitted by persons about us and our work, but we don't know who those persons are, who contacted them, and with what motives they named those persons."

He says that in effect, he was given the results without any explanation of the causes whatsoever. This situation, he feels, can only make those involved suspicious and resentful of the procedure by which tenure is granted. The official procedure is spelled out in a U of T policy statement on academic tenure (first published in Toronto Bulletin, Oct. 1967), but as this former faculty member says, it is only the "shell which surrounds the action," which decides eligibility for tenure.

Asked for comment on these remarks, Prof. M.T. Wilson, chairman of the English department, replied that in 1975 the English department had been revamped, and other than the information already publicly known, it would be impossible for him to comment on the actions of the department prior to 1975.

Stuart Niermeier, however, says "in effect, my career is over." As for the other former faculty member, who is still unemployed, he feels simply that "we played their game, and we lost."

UFW fight goes on support from U of T students sought

By KATHY RYAN

"We shall not be moved." This refrain of a farmworker's song was heard in the Newman Centre yesterday as the United Farm Workers (UFW) meeting drew to a close. About 40 U of T students turned out at the 45-minute gathering to hear UFW representatives describe the union's continuing struggle against the produce growers in California.

Canadian UFW director Mark Johnson began by thanking the U of T volunteers who helped publicize the meeting and asked for additional suggestions on ways to raise money on campus for the UFW. UFW information tables were considered for Sid Smith lobby, and there will possibly be a UFW coffeehouse featuring folk singers.

Johnson went on to say that Toronto boycotts have been very effective in the farmworkers' campaign, even more so than their own strikes. He cited one example where a leading carrot grower in the U.S. formed a contract with the union just one week after boycott threats were publicized in Toronto.

Johnson also praised the interest and participation of U of T students, saying their support is certainly influential in the Farmworkers' campaign. He asked for continuing support, particularly in the areas of distribution of UFW literature and fund raising.

Father Bob Madden of St. Basil's Church has been associated with the workers from the early days of their program. "The UFW is far from dead," he said. He added that the UFW was "more than just a union... it is an entire movement."

6 per cent wage offer brings strike mandate from library workers

U of T's library workers (CUPE 1230) voted Tuesday to give its executive a mandate to call a strike for higher wages "if and when necessary, on the understanding that the executive will return to the membership for approval on the specific action to be taken."

The reason for the strike vote was an offer unacceptable to the library workers that the university gave to the union as a result of conciliation. Management offered a straight 6 per cent wage increase across the board, plus increments averaging 2.05 per cent.

The library workers gained a few non-monetary concessions: access to personnel files and an expanded definition of areas for grievances, but CUPE president Frances Scovill says these are largely superficial. According to Scovill management refused to let the union have any say in the implementation of the expansion of the library automation system. The negotiating team therefore came back to the membership for a strike vote in order to enter mediation and obtain a settlement favorable to the library workers.

Management's offer will be presented to the membership next Thursday.

Protestors confront Evans in his office in Simcoe Hall.

Wednesday demo

Demonstrators walk on Evans

By MARIO CUTAJAR

Militant democracy temporarily took hold of Simcoe Hall Wednesday when about 100 demonstrators invaded U of T President John Evans' office and demanded that he cancel the visit to U of T by two administrators of the South African University of Stellenbosch.

The impromptu meeting in Evans' office came as the climax to an otherwise uneventful demonstration in front of Simcoe Hall organized by the Toronto chapter of the International Committee Against Racism (INCAR).

Toronto CAR chairman Peter Rosenthal said U of T allowed the Stellenbosch administrators to come here because "they figured they could get away with it." In Europe, he said no university administration would dare do the same. That U of T allowed the same, Rosenthal said, "is an insult to us." The purpose of the demonstration, he said, was to make sure that the media would note that the South African visit did not go without a protest.

In a later speech, Rosenthal explained that the issue was not one of free speech. "These austere halls," he said, pointing to Simcoe Hall, "do not receive everybody." The Stellenbosch administrators were being shown a cordiality, Rosenthal said, that the U of T administration has not shown to U of T's own students and faculty.

Rosenthal hinted that although he could not make an attempt himself he would not try to stop anyone from going into Simcoe Hall and ejecting the Stellenbosch representatives. A number of CAR supporters took him up on his word and started walking into Simcoe Hall.

The other demonstrators followed suit.

It turned out that the South Africans were not in Evans' office, although Evans was. The demonstrators immediately struck up a one-sided debate with Evans, who tried to parry questions as best he could.

Evans stated that the university is willing to engage in dialogue with all foreign visitors irrespective of their political beliefs. He also reiterated that he did not consider the Stellenbosch visit an endorsement of apartheid by U of T.

The protesters were not satisfied with this and kept shouting Evans down. Several of them pointed out to Evans that the South African press would use the visit to prove that the South African minority regime is acceptable abroad. They felt that allowing the visit to take place was an indirect endorsement of apartheid. They asked Evans to explicitly denounce apartheid and to prove his opposition to racism by cancelling the rest of the visit. Evans replied that he could accept the first demand but that the second was "unacceptable."

While the debate with Evans was going on the demonstrators debated among themselves on tactics to stop the visit. Some members of the Trotskyist League opposed asking Evans to condemn apartheid on the grounds that as the president of a "capitalist" university he could not help but support apartheid even if he condemned it in words. When the rest of the protesters persisted in their original demands the Trotskyists left.

After they had been in Evans' office for about 15 minutes the protesters agreed to demonstrate at Scarborough College the next day and filed out of the room.

OPEN UP THE MEETINGS

"A little knowledge can be dangerous; ignorance is bliss."

In the granola age of the '70's students are criticized for being apathetic and laid-back. Those who have managed to obtain scraps of information about how governments can be managed have looked to Aristotle, Marx or Mill in their short university years. The Government of Canada similarly is unwilling to divulge a coherent philosophy, much less the facts of bureaucratic management for fear the public will misinterpret them.

Such is the case at U of T. Last Monday a Varsity reporter refused to leave a Planning and Priorities Committee meeting when it voted to enter into closed session to discuss U of T's budget. Subcommittee members voted to adjourn to save face and the embarrassment of physically tossing the reporter out. The reporter left, the meeting continued.

In other words, we lost that one. One of the problems of young adults is responsibility. We should assume certain responsibilities. In order to take our place as responsible Canadians we need the respect responsibility awards.

We demand open budget and planning meetings because we feel we are capable of judging such information. It is true that a little knowledge results in poor interpretations. But complete lack of knowledge breeds dogmatism and ignorance.

We do not wish to slam and damn the policies of the University administration. Over-zealous militancy is foolish and only attracts hostility. We simply wish to know the facts in order to evaluate them and improve the environment and academic excellence of the university.

Ann Auman

Popular power

Some of the students who took part in last Wednesday's confrontation with John Evans over the Stellenbosch visit were in the university president's office for the first time since they've been at U of T. For approximately 15 minutes they were able to talk to Evans as an equal.

The experience was so new to some of the people involved that even as they occupied Evans' office in force they kept addressing him as "sir".

The interesting thing was that the demonstration was caused by a policy that does not directly affect U of T students.

The reason for that is simple. The decision to allow the Stellenbosch representatives to visit U of T demonstrated to students how little say they have in the running of the university. There was a clear-cut moral case against the Stellenbosch visit and the administration chose to ignore it. What would otherwise have been an exotic international issue was thereby transformed into a student issue of immediate importance.

This facility of perceiving the immediate implications of decisions that might otherwise seem innocuous is a necessary prerequisite to the building of a student movement. That enough students were able to make the connection last Wednesday to hold an effective demonstration — the Stellenbosch administrators' visit to Scarborough College was cancelled — suggests that the conditions exist for a resurgence of the student movement.

That same afternoon 700 students confronted Harry Parrott over a more "provincial" issue. It was an example of historical irony that the Stellenbosch demonstration and Parrott's grilling were separated by only a few hours.

Guilt by anatomy

Re: "Who is paranoid? Feminists or Barca?" Varsity Sept. 21.

The prominence of Peter Barca's answer (on the editorial page) to Leslie Barca's earlier writing shows the frightening prospect that nothing has changed in your generation. This generation too seems to subscribe to the principle of "Guilt by Anatomy".

I think, as an older man, that Barca wrote a courageous article. I take particular exception to Barca's line "If a woman can be brutally assaulted and we get off with a touch of guilt, it is hardly an awesome burden" — Why guilt, why not compassion?

Men were and are assaulted by sending them to war (and women gave white feathers to those not out on the front being shot to defend their honours).

Feminism to me means that women are ready to fight their own battles. Their fight should not be at the expense of men. (That would remind us of the good old days.)

If I don't murder, I don't have to feel guilty, when somebody murders with his hands, because I too have hands. I will not rape, to read about it horrifies me, but I refuse to feel guilty, just because I too have a penis.

Library rebuttal

This is in reply to a long letter in last Monday's Varsity, by Robert Watson, who compared the University's library services unfavorably with those of York. I invite Mr. Watson to come in for clarification and discussion of some parts of his letter, but respond here to points which seem to be of general interest. I share his concern for the adequate support of studies in the Humanities and Social Sciences, and must say that the selective shortening of hours, as now recommended by the University's Advisory Committee on the Library System, is designed to cause the least possible inconvenience for students in those fields.

By chance, Mr. Watson's letter appeared on the same day as a two-column piece inserted by the Library in the University's Bulletin, describing the operation of the short-term loan collections. Mr. Watson commends York's reserve-book room. The maximum size of the reserve collection, part of it for long-term loan and some for short-term, is about 14,000 volumes. By contrast our reserve-book collection, as distinct from general stack collections, is the whole collection of the Sigmund Samuel Library, some 250,000 volumes of which the great majority are on long term loan, and only about 5,000 moved temporarily to a short-term-loan section behind a counter. Any precise comparison of adequacy is difficult to make, but the comparable figures in this instance seem to be 14,000 volumes at York as against 250,000 here.

While the Sigmund Samuel library has a staff-operated photocopy service as well as coin-operated machines, the staff agrees that there are not enough machines. We did order another five-cent copier for installation before the beginning of term, but the wiring for it has been delayed by the electricians' strike. It will be there as soon as we can get it, and if it is still not enough to handle the traffic at that price, more equipment will be ordered.

It is true that York is several years ahead of us in automating their loan records. At Toronto we have given higher priority to the automation of catalogue records as the logical basis for a more comprehensive system which will soon include automated circulation. Meanwhile our microcatalogues are widely distributed on campus to an extent that was quite impossible with card catalogues.

Robert H. Blackburn
Chief Librarian

Librarians hit too

In response to Robert Watson letter on Undergraduate Library service.

It's certainly true that service for undergraduates at Sigmund Samuel Library has reached a new low this term, but students aren't the only ones affected by government cutbacks and the University's warped priorities. Those "2 or 3 attendants" at the reserve desk at Sig. Sam, are also victims of these cuts, as are all library workers.

The University has sunk millions into building Roberts Library as a slouchy example of U of T's progress, and has spent millions more in the conversion to automation. The result has been that undergrad service has suffered, Roberts Library is barely useful even for graduate students when any book or journal is in demand, and the library staff has been subjected to a really serious increase in the work-load in various public-service departments. The reason for these cutbacks is lack of funds.

This speed-up has been accomplished by drastically cutting back on the number of student part-time staff (thereby helping to increase an already intolerable level of student unemployment) and by leaving full-time jobs vacant.

The U of T Library staff has historically been underpaid and spread very thin, but the latest cuts in public service spending have brought service, at least in Sig. Sam., to the breaking point. With three full time staff positions vacant and almost no part-time help during peak periods, it is clear that the University, represented by the Library administration has different priorities than do the students and staff.

The reserve desk at Sig. Sam. has always been one of the busiest sections of the library. But last year with a maximum effort and boundless good cheer we were able (after three years of fighting for more staff) to provide some semblance of service. This year with our public desk staff cut in half and our circulation rising, we are unable to keep up with the demands placed on us.

Clearly, students and staff will continue to be the victims of cutbacks and misplaced spending priorities as long as we let one single cutback go by without fighting it, and as long as the University feels it can get away with making us bear the effects of their financial problems.

Gross leap forward

The recommendation by the Task Force on Canadian Studies to make Grade 13 French an absolute admission requirement for U. of T. has got to be the grossest leap towards yet greater ineptitude in the student admission process.

Already high school teachers wield an unwarranted power over the student intending to go to university. Now this student's irritants are being supplemented by a major new obstacle: the requirement that he take a demonstrably ineffective five-year French program throughout high school.

Another objectionable aspect of this requirement is that the Grade 9 student at age 14 is forced to decide upon a university career. This will particularly discriminate against students of less educated backgrounds.

This abrupt recommendation is curiously timed, coming hard on the heels of the discovery of rampant illiteracy in English(!) among university students.

Now French can be added to the painful list of things we should know but don't.

Was the uproar for basic English competence merely a passing fad?

Poster paradox

It is one of the paradoxes of liberal democracy that anti-democratic elites can use democratic institutions to destroy freedom. This I believe is the irony of the Trotskyist League's complaining of supposed restrictions on its freedom of speech. For if there ever were a revolution of the sort that the Trotskyists want, freedom of speech would be the first thing to go. Indeed, the first thing Lenin did after the revolution was to set up a terrorist secret police. Without Trotsky who controlled the Red Army, Lenin could not have done anything, and the democratic government which had replaced the Tsar would never have been overthrown.

It is a typical communist deception that left-wing elites denounce oppression in South Africa and thereby draw attention to a small evil while communism escapes unnoticed. The declining regimes of Ian Smith and John Vorster oppress a few millions while communist regimes (many professing the same ideals as the Trotskyists) oppress countless millions and are daily increasing in strength. It may be true that South Africa could not survive without Western loans, but it is certainly true that the Soviet Empire could not survive without them. And without Western technology to spy on the people of the Empire, without Western wheat grown by reactionary bourgeois farmers in Saskatchewan. If communists ever take over Canada, where will we get our bread?

Communists are dangerous people. What reason have we to believe that the Trotskyist League ("U of T Club") is any different from or even unconnected to other communist elites or governments? According to the strength of law in a country, communists do all they think they can get away with. No communist revolution has been popular or democratic, none has solved exploitation in the sense of ending it, none has produced as high a median standard of living as a liberal democracy could have, and all have proved Lord Acton's maxim about corruption and power. I'm not calling for a witch hunt but a recognition of what communism means.

Moreover, it is not true that "All those who defend democratic rights must oppose the new regulations (on posters in Sid Smith)". Dean Churcher has responsibilities; the Trotskyist elite has none and is seeking to wear down our society and overthrow liberal democracy. If the Dean wants to ensure that politics (not to say subversion) at the university does not interfere with learning (as at many universities in Europe), perhaps regulations are necessary. Of course, the regulations may be directed only against obscenity or advertisements, and maybe the persecution of leftist elites is purely the work of hopeful imagination.

Jeans come clean

Further to a letter published in Varsity's Editorial section from Oleh B. Ilnyckij regarding The Jean Store. I simply wish to clarify that this was a genuine error made by a part-time sales clerk, who was unaware of the ad being published on Friday, Sept. 23rd, 1977 — the same day on which Mr. Ilnyckij came to the Jean Store to take advantage of the 10 per cent sale to students who presented their student card, and also to receive his free T-Shirt.

Unfortunately, Mr. Ilnyckij never left his name and phone number, so that I could not contact him and rectify the situation the next day. Instead he wrote me a letter of complaint which I received Sept. 29. I replied with a letter of apology the same day. I wrote Mr. Ilnyckij to please come into the store at any time, and we would refund the 10 per cent owed him along with a free T-shirt as promised in the Varsity ad. I simply wish to state that a genuine error was made, not false advertising as I am sure the students of U. of T. are well aware. When Mr. Ilnyckij visits the Jean Store, he will receive full retribution.

Long live Chairman Mao Tse Tung's China

October 1, 1977 marked the twenty-eighth anniversary of the founding of Chairman Mao Tse tung's People's Republic of China. This is the second anniversary since the passing away of Mao Tse tung, and the first anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China since revisionists and opportunists seized control of the Party and state leadership in China. The restoration of Teng Hsiao-ping was the climax of the restoration activities carried out by the revisionists and opportunists of all hues in China.

The fact that the revisionist and opportunist leadership has taken control of the Party and state does not imply that People's Republic of China is no longer a socialist country and that the Communist Party of China is no longer a Marxist-Leninist party. What it means is that the class struggle has become acute in China and that the capitalist roaders and restorationists have "won" temporary victory. What will win out, socialism or capitalism, Marxism or revisionism, has to be decided yet.

There are false "friends" of China masquerading under various signboards, some of them even calling themselves "Marxist-Leninist", who are creating maximum ideological and political confusion about the matter. Instead of defending socialism in China and upholding Marxism + Leninism and proletarian internationalism, these "friends" are extremely gleeful about the revisionists and opportunists of all hues seizing control of the Party and state leadership in China.

There are some opportunists and anarcho-fascists who are mystifying the entire issue. They are trying to suggest that our Party is "anti-Chinese" while they are the "friends" of China. We say it quite openly, and with a loud and clear voice so that no one may misunderstand us or complain later that they did not hear us properly. We firmly hold that to support the restoration of Teng Hsiao-ping and the seizure of Party and state leadership by revisionists and opportunists of all hues is to attack Chairman Mao Tse tung, the Communist Party of China, the People's Republic of China, the Chinese people and socialism in China. That is to be the enemy of the people of China and to be in the company of imperialism, social-imperialism and all reaction. To be a genuine supporter of Chairman Mao Tse tung, the Communist Party of China, the People's Republic of China, the Chinese people and socialism in China is to firmly criticize and denounce the revisionist and opportunist lines being propagated by the revisionists and opportunists of all hues in China and denounce the restoration of Teng Hsiao-ping.

The bankruptcy and degeneration of the opportunists and anarcho-fascists is so profound that they "explain" the attitude of our Party towards revisionism and opportunism in China by whining that we attack these revisionists and opportunists because they did not "recognize" us. The opportunists and anarcho-fascists should hear it clearly that it is not a question of revisionists and opportunists of all hues in China and elsewhere "recognizing" our Party, it is a question of our Party courageously standing against revisionism and opportunism of all hues. We have not changed our line. We are the resolute followers of Marx, Engels, Lenin, Stalin, Mao Tse tung and Enver Hoxha as we always have been in the past. It is the opportunists and anarcho-fascists who, for a time, attempted to hide in the ranks of the Marxist-Leninists and cause ideological and political confusion. Now the lines are clearly drawn. Where do you stand on the question of revisionist and opportunist seizure of Party and State leadership in China? Where do you stand on the question of the anti-Leninist theory of "three worlds"? These are the demarcation lines between genuine Marxist-Leninists and the sham Marxist-Leninists. Furthermore, where do you stand on the question of People's Socialist Republic of Albania? Do you consider it the only genuine socialist country in the world or do you mix it up with all sorts of hodge-podge? Where do you stand on the question of the Party of Labour of Albania and the leadership of Comrade Enver Hoxha?

1. Our Party resolutely denounces the restoration of Teng Hsiao-ping.
2. Our Party resolutely opposes the revisionist and opportunist leadership which seized the leadership of the Party and state in China in October of 1976.
3. Our Party resolutely denounces the anti-Leninist theory of "three worlds".
4. Our Party considers the People's Socialist Republic of Albania as the only genuinely socialist country.
5. Our Party considers the Party of Labour of Albania as the leader of the International Marxist-Leninist Communist Movement.
6. Our Party considers Comrade Enver Hoxha a great Marxist-Leninist and leader of the International Marxist-Leninist Communist Movement.

Those who have the genuine interests of proletarian revolution and the national liberation struggle at heart; those who have the genuine interests of socialism and the defeat of imperialism, social-imperialism and all reaction on the agenda; and those who will defend Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism with their lives must come forward and denounce the restoration of Teng Hsiao-ping, denounce the seizure of Party and state leadership in China by the revisionists and opportunists of all hues and vigorously support the People's Socialist Republic of Albania, the Party of Labour of Albania and Comrade Enver Hoxha. The best interests of the Chinese people can only be served by doing so. The best interests of the people of the world can only be served by doing so.

On the twenty-eighth anniversary of the founding of Chairman Mao Tse tung's People's Republic of China, Toronto Student Movement (TSM) sends revolutionary best wishes to the people of China and is certain that the people of China will win victory against their enemies in the not too distant future. TSM vigorously halts the twenty-eighth anniversary of the founding of Chairman Mao Tse tung's People's Republic of China and is confident that Chairman Mao's China will prevail over its enemies.

LONG LIVE CHAIRMAN MAO TSE TUNG'S PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA!

DOWN WITH THE RESTORATION OF TENG HSIAO-PING!

DOWN WITH THE ANTI-LENINIST THEORY OF "THREE WORLDS"!

NDP colleges critic charges new student aid plan a farce

By BRIGITTE MERTLING

In a small and informal meeting at Hart House yesterday, Ted Bounsall, NDP Critic of Colleges and Universities very succinctly stated that "the new loan-grant scheme that the Minister is dribbling out is a farce."

Bounsall, MPP for Windsor riding, spoke at the invitation of the U of T NDP Club about the proposed revision of the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP). The Member treated the small handful of students attending to a complete recap of party policy concerning student aid. Following a series of critics of the individual elements in the new plan, Bounsall offered several brief solutions.

The main clout of the NDP argument is that the new plan, which proposes to make the grant portion of the award the first segment and the loan portion the second, "does not really help any university student." Instead, Bounsall argues, it creates the need for an unreported part-time job. In this way, we are "training a generation of university students to cheat on their loan applications. If we ever wanted to create a society of cheaters, all we would need to do is sit down and show them this system — they are the brightest and most capable."

Solutions are difficult. Bounsall suggested the elimination of tuition fees for all students, inclusion of a "grandfather clause" protecting students already in the system, and removal of restrictions on the number and sequence of the eight allotted grant periods.

A short question and answer period followed in which several of the students discussed with Bounsall the new program, and the forum with Minister of Colleges and Education Harry Parrott at Seneca College, Wednesday.

U of T advertises for students and dollars

Is it the U of T that's doing all the advertising for new students and funds on posters in the subways, in banks and around town?

Yes and no. U of T has several advertising campaigns going on at the present. One to encourage private funding for UPDATE, is paid by private donors. Another, to encourage application for non-credit courses at the University's School of Continuing Studies, comes out of the school's budget.

Advertising does improve the community image of the University, said Bob Burdett, supervisor of Promotion and Public Relations for the School of Continuing Studies. The recent two month subway campaign helps increase public awareness of these kinds of programs. It illustrates how the university serves community needs, he said.

The 110 billboards advertising Update going up around Metro donated by Claude Neon Company, weren't paid for by the University, said Lee MacLauren, director of private funding for Update.

In fact, Update uses three kinds of outside advertising for their fund-raising campaigns, all of which have been donated. In addition to the billboards contributed by the billboard company, Toronto Life has donated a full page of advertising in an upcoming issue.

The four chartered banks have distributed small heavy cardboard posters to all their branches advertising the U of T cause.

The $1,700 subway campaign was seen by 500,000 people a day for the two month period it went on, estimated Burdett, who said his office originated it. Local colleges such as Humber, George Brown and Seneca, have had considerable success in that kind of advertising, he said.

Burdett said one billboard which showed several well-dressed people in front of Hart House, and a caption "Join the Professionals" for non-credit business courses, wasn't misleading people despite the current economic conditions. "The school doesn't offer any certificates," he said. The business courses in the school are largely for businessmen hoping to upgrade their skills, and for others who theoretically would have need for such skills.

Most of the people attending the School of Continuing Studies are university graduates, Burdett said.

Health centre busy at test time

By RHONDA TEPPER

Anxiety illnesses created by exams are one of the major reasons U of T students visit their health service, according to administrative staff member Jean Gunn.

The Health Centre, located at 256 Huron St. has its "seasons", said Gunn at exam test time, many students are physically affected by anxiety. Other common emergencies include lab accidents and athletic injuries.

Gunn emphasized the convenience of OHIP coverage or an equivalent source of medical-financial insurance for students utilizing the services of the Health Centre. Should a student need to be transported to the hospital for further observation or treatment, explained Gunn, fees could run up to $200 per day, depending on treatment. All services at the centre are paid for by OHIP if the student has coverage.

There is no major medicinal dispensary at the said Gunn Centre and a doctor or nurse on staff will recommend medication or write prescriptions. Many students receive their regular allergy shots at the centre. Faculty members' families utilize the centre's services, said Gunn. Summer students and university students from other Ontario universities use the clinic during the summer period.

The centre often receives requests for a medical certificate after a student has performed poorly on or missed entirely a test or exam, said Gunn. Students appear pleading that they were physically ill or under severe stress at the time.

Gunn emphasized that the Centre "rarely sympathizes" with such cases and will not provide illegal medical support.

All patient information is kept strictly confidential if the students so request, said Gunn. The Centre does not offer counselling services, however. Gunn pointed out that the psychiatric counselling centre is just across the street. For regular appointments, the centre tries to accommodate a student's schedule to their office hours. Students may also request a particular physician on the staff, she said.

John Cage's 65th birthday party really commemoration

The New Music Concerts got off to an auspicious start with the music of John Cage, Saturday night. A program in honor of his 65th birthday was presented in Walter Hall to a capacity and highly approving audience. Six pieces drawn from Cage's lengthy career in contemporary composition were played, seen, sung or acted by different performers. The combinations went all the way from contralto plus closed piano (used as a percussion instrument) to a 24 piece ensemble of singers, orchestral instruments and electronic sounds.

The obvious high esteem in which Mr. Cage was held both by players and audience gave special liveliness and clarity to the evening. Music is not just on the stage and in the note, John Cage says. And so it wasn't. His broadly smiling presence gave testimony to the central principle that musicians, audience and composer need not be isolated from each other as entertainers and entertained. The same people can actually do both.

The oldest work presented, Five Songs for Contralto, put five poems by e. e. cummings into a serial music setting that undoubtedly sprang from Cage's studies under Arnold Schoenberg. Fairly conservative by the standards of later Cage pieces, Five Songs still provides an interesting and plausible version of the famous cummings poems. Patricia Rideout gave a full, rich rendition and Marion Ross did justice to the piano part.

Cage's association with percussion ensembles in the late 1930s and early 40s was reflected in The Wonderful Widow of Eighteen Springs (1942), again sung by Rideout, with Russell Hartenberger performing percussion accompaniment on closed lid and other parts of the piano. The text is from James Joyce.

In Amores (1943), the middle two movements are for percussion trio, while the first and fourth are solos for a specially prepared piano (screws, bolts or pieces of rubber were placed between various strings). The exotic and most compelling sound of that instrument came across less like that of a piano and more like that of a small ensemble. The percussion movements, one for tom-toms, one for wood blocks, were given serious and convincing performances by Bob Becker, Robin Engelman and Russell Hartenberger. John Cage's consistent musicality — no matter what paraphernalia are involved — was evident throughout.

A potential misordering of the movements in Amores was averted when an unembarrassed Mr. Cage tiptoed on stage with a broad grin and whispered to pianist Ross that she had begun movement four too soon: the third had not yet happened. Her shock was countered perfectly by an unabashed and sizeable kiss on the cheek from Mr. Cage.

The first half of the concert was brought to a delightful close by an extended theatrical process called Songbooks, written in 1970. The Lyric Arts Trio, consisting of Mary Morrison, Robert Aitken and Marion Ross, played and acted this charming entertainment. It was vintage Cage, consisting of "solos" to be performed in any sequence by any of the three performers alone, severally, or all at once. A "solo" might be a melodic idea or a theatrical invention, each with or without amplification. Chess was played, popcorn popped, songs sung, the flute made to emit its own sound plus growls and hums, a towel used on Mr. Aitken's back, a chalkboard hieroglyphed, and much more. All the while, bird and other sounds emerged from around the theatre. The ensemble seemed to enjoy the piece thoroughly, as did Mr. Cage and the audience, and the result was a successful entertainment for many senses.

The second half of the program brought two longer pieces for larger ensemble, Atlas Eclipticalis (1961) and the 1974 creation, Score (40 Drawings by Thoreau) and 23 Parts: Twelve Haiku followed by a Recording of the Dawn at Stoney Point, New York, August 6, 1974. Each of these pieces results from treating visual representations as instructions for making sound. Atlas uses a graph of an astronomical atlas to produce percussive parts. Each performer's part for Score is a fragment from a set of doodles by Henry David Thoreau. Since freedom and reliance upon chance are John Cage ideals, the instructions for Atlas are not surprising when they say that either or both of two earlier works may be played at the same time as Atlas (they were played Saturday night). And Score is written for "any instruments and/or voices."

Robert Aitken, artistic director for the New Music Concerts, conducted Score, and Mr. Cage himself was prevailed upon to conduct Atlas, which he accomplished mainly by describing the motion of a clock with his arms. This latter is an ingenious solution to the problem of keeping a chance ensemble within the same time frames without compromising the aleatory elements.

Earlier in the day, in a composition forum held at noon, John Cage remarked that he didn't think orchestra musicians really enjoy their jobs; many of them don't seem too happy to him. He tries to write music they will like, he says. One thing is clear about John Cage's own involvement with music over the years: he loves what he is doing, and he seems most happy if others do too. What is technique in other hands often becomes art in his. Saturday night was a celebration of Cage, the man and the musician, a birthday gladly remembered.

James Seymore

Cage might observe that no matter how far avant-garde one goes, the establishment always catches up.

Every other aspect of jazz in T.O.

For all you jazz fans who voraciously absorbed my last article on Toronto's jazz clubs, here's the sequel. Of course live music in the clubs is infinitely preferable to anything else, but it tends to be more expensive than other forms of entertainment. What are the other possibilities? For starters, there's radio, records, and best of all, playing your own jazz.

At least four FM stations carry regular jazz shows. On CKFM 99.9, Phil McKellar and All That Jazz is aired on Sunday nights 10 pm-6 am. CBC FM 94.1 presents Jazz Radio Canada every Saturday 2:05-4:00 pm, which is also on Thursday 8:30-10:00 pm on CBC AM 740. Also on 94.1 is

That Midnight Jazz with Ted O'Reilly, Monday through Friday midnight-1 am, and Music to Listen to Jazz By, Sunday 11 pm-1 am. Q107 FM has condensed to feature one hour of jazz each week, Sunday at 10 pm. And CFNY FM 102.1, while not allocating a specific slot, tries to fit a jazz tune in at least once an hour.

CKQS FM offers the most comprehensive programming of all, totalling 22 hours per week of jazz. Paul Fisher hosts Music for Night People midnight to 2 am Monday to Friday, and midnight to 5 am Saturday. These shows are also broadcast on CKLB AM 1350. Paul tries to play complete sides of albums so that listeners may decide if they want the album. The Saturday show features either a guest or a concert recording in its entirety. This week, Thelonius Monk in concert. Also on 94.9, every Saturday from 10 pm-midnight, Hal Hill presents From Bebop to Now. This week, Ian McDougall of the Boss Brass.

If you can afford to buy your own records, most record stores carry a reasonable variety of mainstream jazz. Round Records on Bloor W. is cheaper than most. But for specialization, The Jazz and Blues Centre at 893 Yonge St. carries a wide selection, emphasizing modern and avant garde jazz. Bill Smith, of the Canadian Creative Music Collective, runs the shop, and he's always ready to hold forth at length on any subject. He also carries an assortment of books and magazines on jazz-related topics. Best of all, he buys and sells used records, and always has a fair stock at decent prices.

Bill Smith, far right, of the Canadian Creative Music Collective.

If you've got a spare hour or two, try listening to a few jazz albums in one of the two listening facilities on campus. The Edward Johnson Music Library has a small, fairly dated collection, listed under 'Jazz' (what else?). Record Room B in Hart House offers a more extensive choice, although some Dave Brubeck-Duke Ellington fan has had excessive influence. I would say the period 1945-1965 is most represented. To use the facility, students must take a short, ½ hour course in use and misuse of stereo systems, after which you'll be entitled to a Record Room Card. Speak to the Hall Porter for more details.

Later this month the Central Library near Yonge and Bloor will open its doors to the public, and among its attractions will be an 800-album jazz section. As at Hart House and Edward Johnson, the records cannot be signed out, nor is taping equipment available. However, many of Toronto's other public libraries allow sign-out privileges, e.g. the Willowdale Public Library.

The best collection of jazz books is at the Edward Johnson Music Library, which contains books on most aspects of the jazz world. For an excellent overview, read The Jazz Book by Berendt. Free Jazz by Jost is a fascinating excursion into the uncharted region of unstructured improvisation.

For over a year now the Toronto New School of Music has been offering instruction in jazz performance. Although other music outfits offer some jazz instruction, the New School teaches exclusively jazz, primarily to people who have some classical training but want to learn improvisation. A number of complementary approaches are available. One may begin with private instruction: the teachers have all played professionally, and some, for example Don Englert on reeds, have graduated from big band and studio work in the States. Theory courses are also offered, to familiarize the student with jazz harmony.

To complete the learning experience, the school organizes performance workshops for its students. Each shop consists of a rhythm section, three soloists and a staff member who directs and advises. The groups meet for two hours every other weekend, and concentrate primarily on mainstream tunes with the emphasis, of course, on improvisation. Howie Spring, who operates the school and teaches guitar, informs me that the workshops require some basic knowledge of jazz, and that the cost is $5 for each two-hour session. Howie has lots of other ideas, and would love to discuss how he can tailor a program to your jazz needs. 264 Dupont at Spadina, 923-4955.

For those who can improvise already, two locations around town feature regular open jam sessions. The Music Gallery, 30 Patrick St., reserves every Thursday evening for jamming; amateurs are invited. Call them up at 598-2400 for more reassurance. Secondly, Cafe Soho at Queen and Spadina offers open jams every Tuesday and Wednesday night after hours (i.e. after midnight), and Saturdays after 12 noon. This writer hopes to drop in tomorrow with his flute — see you there.

OPENING HART HOUSE INFORMAL DEBATE

RESOLVED: THAT ENGINEERS ARE THE LIFEblood OF THE UNIVERSITY

Come one, come all to see the Skuleboys try to speak English (for once), in a desperate attempt to defend their position against the clear thinking and superior arguments of the Arts & Science debaters.

Oct. 11 at 12:00 noon in King's College Circle by the bookstore (Oct. 13 if it rains).

Klotz is quadrophobic

Cold weather, threatening rain clouds and driving winds played havoc with last Wednesday's outdoor jazz concert. The 16 musicians of Phil Nimmons'n Nine plus Six must have thought long and hard about their situation, as they played a noon-hour concert in the Hart House quadrangle.

It was the size of the audience, about 300, which had led to the concert being held outdoors; regrettably a suitable indoor location could not be arranged. Big band jazz is exciting because of its power and its harmonic density and richness, all of which project to their best advantage in an enclosed area. The proper mix and dynamics are more difficult to attain when a sudden gust of wind can transform 'mp' into 'ppp'. And an inside location would not have featured a four-foot stone wall between the band and audience, which also proved to be an acoustic nightmare.

But enough complaining. The band performed a fine concert in spite of the problems, in which just about every musician blew a solo or two. For those of us who have had the pleasure to play in a big band, there is no experience as fulfilling as improvising in that context. Whatever comes out of the instrument sounds better against the background of full instrumentation. Most of the soloists rose to the occasion, except for a few whose lacklustre efforts were probably due to cold fingers and to their frustration with sheet music that continually blew off the stands (to the perverse delight of the audience).

One of the nicest tunes was an original, Think Nice Thoughts, written for Ted O'Reilly. Characteristically for Nimmons, the arrangement was exceedingly pretty, giving the soloists an opportunity to play sweet, melodic lines. A single trumpet brought in the quiet minor themes, leading to an improvisation by Mike Malone on flugelhorn. Like most band members he is an established soloist in his own right, having performed in quartets and quintets around town for at least the past five years. His playing indicates that his music has matured: tasteful, sparse, with an excellent tone and fine, well-executed ideas. Guitarist Andy Krehm then followed with no less enjoyable a solo while the band played stopped time beneath him. Andy was having a wonderful time and his ideas reflected this. After a disappointing piano solo by cold and unhappy Gary Williamson, the band took the tune out, ending on a major chord. Very nice!

John Capon on bass trombone gave the finest performance of the concert in a lovely ballad entitled 'A Time for Love'. Also notable were efforts by Dave Fields on bass, and Herbie Spanier on trumpet.

The concert was the first in a series of jazz concerts, henceforth to be held indoors at Hart House, every Wednesday at noon.

Lust for life: Iggy impotent

Iggy Pop, the underground rock crazie of the seventies, is riding high on the popularity of punk rock. Unfortunately the new punks can out-slash, out-flop and incidentally out-play the aging Mr. Pop. So in steps David Bowie who picks Iggy up, gives him a new band, a new sound and a couple of records with lyric sheets and revilingly audible lyrics. Voila. Poet.

Iggy's first album with Bowie, The Idiot, was fraught with incomprehensible but menacing lyrics, reasonably macabre melodies and Enosque arrangements. The cover depicted Iggy standing in the rain (heavy symbolism) looking suitably crazed.

And now we have Lust for Life, the latest Pop-Bowie off-spring. And guess what? Iggy is smiling on the cover. There he is, in glorious black and white (again, heavy symbolism) giving the biggest goddam toothy grin this side of Doris Day. My God. And the songs. "Turn Blue" is a gospel number. The music stops for the obligatory four beats and Mr. Pop says in his deepest, most sincere Jim Nabors voice, "Jesus, this is Iggy." From there he goes on to apologize to his mother for having been such a bad boy in days gone by.

That's not to say that this is an album by one of those bimbos who give up rock, bury their Telecasters in their wheat fields and then go on to write songs about how the oil slicks are hurting the ducks. The music still has that haunting mechanical quality that is so much a part of the Eno school of musical appreciation. The title song moves along in the best Raw Power tradition. But the energy of old has been replaced with dissonant bass lines. Hardly a fair exchange.

Iggy, this is Paul. As much as I hate to say it, we need re-assurance again. If you want to be a poet, stop beating around the bush and start writing songs about granola. If you want to be a punk, stop telling us about your parental problems. And if you want to be a progressive rocker in the Bowie-Eno tradition, don't use the Ramones as an opening act. And Iggs, stop smiling.

Grave gathering outside sacred grove

"Ah, the mystery of foreign tongues . . . if we could plumb their secrets . . . a pall of dismay would fall on a world newly tutored in the knowledge that dullards abound in every clime."

from Pogo by Walt Kelly
April 17, 1959.

An international group of scholars and students of literature met last weekend in the Stephen Leacock building at McGill University in Montreal for the unique purpose of assessing the state of paraliterature studies in Canada. That they should even consider the term paraliterature, which is newly coined and rarely used, is, in itself, unique. Paraliterature seems to be a huge boundless territory embodying perhaps 95 percent of all printed matter. This includes all the comics, dusters, romances, magazines, detective stories, spy novels, Hardy Boy adventures, science fiction, cereal boxes, and innumerable other cheap, easy and entertaining strings that catch the eye, and demand so much attention from the modern man. Indeed, any text outside of the sacred grove of serious literature could be considered paraliterature, from commercial advertising, which Huxley labelled "pecuniary poetry", to the literary works of Dickens, by virtue of their initial publication in newspapers as pure entertainment for the masses. It is "low" literature, pop culture in print.

Many of the workshops at the conference helped to illustrate the difference, or often the lack of difference, between "high" and "low" literature, by presenting some of the scholarly research that has involved paraliterary genres. Professor Barbara Bucknell of Brock University demonstrated the similarity of the works of Rabelais to the modern comic strip. Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel is characterized by short episodes that rely on the marvellous and the fantastic in much the same way as Al Capp's Li'l Abner or Walt Kelly's Pogo. These three works share a common image of a psychologically simple man in a highly variegated natural world. The lack of narrative logic, and the continual juxtaposition of the comic and tragic elements of life that characterized the bawdy tales of Rabelais help to mark his style as a precursor of certain modern comic strips.

David Ketterer of Concordia University spoke of the scant body of Canadian science fiction, attributing its scarcity to the conservative history of Canada's social and technological development. There are several important science fiction novels, such as James de Mille's A Manuscript Found in a Copper Cylinder and F.P. Grove's Consider Her Ways, but these works are not typical of popular science fiction. Most of Canada's current science fiction deals with near future political thrillers like the works of Richard Rohmer.

The unique structure of detective fiction was demonstrated and analyzed in a number of papers. Professor David Atkinson of the University of Lethbridge followed the evolution of the classical detective story, beginning with Poe's tales of mystery that featured the unerring ruminations of the narrator trying to solve an obscure intellectual puzzle. This style of narrative was further popularized by Arthur Conan Doyle, whose hero Sherlock Holmes solved the insoluble with the cool detachment of a taxidermist. In yet another way, G.K. Chesterton's Father Brown detected criminals by intuition, by becoming involved in the passions of the criminal mind.

Detective stories underwent an important change when they were popularized in America by the works of Raymond Chandler and Dashiell Hammett. The detection of the crime became secondary to the psychology of the detective who, in typical novels like The Big Sleep and The Thin Man, was a hard-boiled dick more interested in money and booze than in the defense of justice.

Professor Mark Freiman, director of the Program of Popular Culture at University College, helped to shift the focus of the conference from genre analysis to the broader implications of paraliterature to the reading public, by outlining a schematic view of the classical detective story.

According to Freiman, the reader is presented with an insoluble problem (the crime) and a detective, who is usually accompanied by an unwitting accomplice, most popularly represented by the relationship of Dr. Watson to Sherlock Holmes. By observing the rules of "fair play", the author gives the reader all the clues (however obscure) that are needed to solve the crime. Yet the reader most commonly identifies with the "Watson" of a particular story, in that the clues do not seem to lead to the solution of the crime.

Of course, the detective is always successful in his efforts to solve the crime. And despite the frustrated efforts of "Watson" and the reader, the clues do seem to retrospectively point to the culprit. The inability of Watson to perceive the truth scoffs at the notion that logic cannot solve problems. In this way, the detective novel reinforces a conservative ideology by demonstrating that logic always prevails. The triumph of the detective establishes the maintenance of the status quo.

This conservative ideology that characterizes detective fiction seems to extend to many other aspects of paraliterature. Western novels invariably portray the cowboy's triumph over the forces of a hostile society or environment. Modern paraliterary tales such as Star Trek (whose original working title was Wagon Train To the Stars), Star Wars, and the gamut of superhuman stories that began with the Adventures of Superman and end with the Bionic Man, Woman, and Dog — all portray the triumph of virtue against extra-terrestrial, superhuman odds.

In contrast to this phenomenon of popular conservatism, much of the high literature of the twentieth century shows that, realistically, the basic virtue of man is a fallacy. The works of our acknowledged literary masters, from Joyce to Dostoyevsky to Fynchon, undermine this conservatism by showing that, in real life, logic and reason rarely persevere. They portray life as it really is, a steady progression of events in which man is an unwitting and powerless participant.

It becomes apparent here that what we call paraliterature possesses certain powerful social and moral suasions. Paraliterary works offer the reality of a closed universe which is not contingent upon everyday reality. They are highly structured on the premise that what seems least possible is indeed likely. By substituting variables within a rigid narrative structure, paraliterary works produce endless variations on a single theme.

The effect of these paraliterary works is to reaffirm the existence of two systems of literary art that serve the "highbrow" and "lowbrow" needs of the reading public. What we may call "highbrow" involves innovation, the creative exploration of a previously unexpressed thesis within the framework of a unique artistic style. Such serious literature satisfies the long term needs of the reader. "Lowbrow", or popular literature, is essentially a simplification process, offering a superficial, escapist view of life to satisfy the short term needs (and the short attention span) of the reader.

If this new classification called paraliterature does exist, then a new system of para-aesthetics is needed to describe it, according to Professor Theall of McGill University. Theall stated that we are presently agonizing once again over the nature of literature. The preoccupation with popular culture, the complexity of forms of mass communication such as advertising and periodicals, and the increasing interplay of sociology and literary criticism have extended the boundaries of literature into a new realm. Paraliterature, according to Theall, was coined as a means of separating "cultural" texts, which serve the immediate popular needs of the reading public, from literary texts.

Theall suggested that there is an inherent danger in this arbitrary label of paraliterature. Although paraliterature may not truly be considered as akin to literature, there is a need for a paraliterary analysis that examines literature in the context of popular culture. In this way, the borders of literary criticism can be extended to the outer limits of subjectivity, to embrace the catholicity and technological complexity of modern culture.

The value judgement implicit in the comparative terms of "high" and "low" literature, or art and entertainment, was a large part of the debate on paraliterature. Such judgements imply a social stratification that many feel is basically a product of a capitalist society, and is therefore arbitrary and useless.

In this respect, Professor Darko Suvin of McGill University outlined some of the relationships that exist between literature and sociology. Suvin noted that any genre is a product of aesthetic purpose and implied readership. James Joyce said, "My producers are also my consumers," and nowhere is this more true than in the realm of paraliterature. Paraliterature is a phenomenon of mass culture and its relation to a capitalist system of promotion, according to Suvin. Of course, capitalism can only serve to degrade literature by emphasizing profit motivation in authors and publishers. In effect, the medium of paraliterature becomes its own message — the production of a product designed to satisfy a consumer-oriented culture. Suvin concluded that it is up to the paraliterary authors to overcome the triviality of their genres, and produce something that is new and significant in a field that is paralyzed by an addiction to profit.

The ramifications of this trend towards the inoffensive and the homogeneous are both obvious and disturbing. Robert Christgau, a senior editor with the Village Voice, applied this artistic degradation to the history of rock 'n' roll. He outlined the genesis of rock in a climate of search for artistic truths and experimentation that climaxed in 1969. Since that time, record sales have skyrocketed, but the musical material has undergone a "schlockification" that leaves the sincere aesthetic and political inspiration of the sixties far behind. Despite the ideological backlash of punk rock, rock music seems to exist only for profit.

The Conference on the State of Paraliterary Studies in Canada tried to grasp at the significance of the popular swing to these highly structured simplifying works. What are the implications of an art form that is principally motivated by profit? What are the implications of a public that seems to have an insatiable appetite for such art?

These questions were pondered in debate and in the implicit tone of the actual presentations. No consensus was reached as to the suitability of the term paraliterature to describe these genres. It seems that paraliterature cannot be easily separated from the other phenomena of popular culture. Paraliterature may be better considered as a cultural phenomenon rather than as a literary sub-classification.

The Canadian Group for Studies in Paraliterature and Popular Culture, the sponsors of the conference, represent the marriage of sociology and literary criticism that the analysis of popular culture demands. The inception of university departments of popular culture such as that small body at University College, is a primary step towards an appreciation of popular culture that has spread to many other schools in Canada and the United States.

This conference provided no answers to the complex problems it studied. It may only have shown how much there is yet to learn, and given an indication of a possible framework for the analysis of popular culture. As one lay reader said to George Szanto, the principal organizer of the conference, "You may know a lot about literature, but you sure don't know much about reading."

Is paraliterature a true perspective on the universe.

The past clarifies itself

Julia: Filmed memories merge in a single moment

"Art is the creation of forms symbolic of human feeling."
Suzanne K. Langer, Feeling and Form.

'In certain old paintings,' says, Lillian Hellman at the outset of Julia, as Jane Fonda's incarnation of her form fishes, hunched over in a wooden dory in a gloom of mist which might be dusk or dawn, 'the paints become transparent and reveal what lies beneath . . . This is called pentimento, for the artist has repented, changed his mind.' Hellman continues to note the similarity of her memories to the paint which clarifies to let that which lies beneath show forth.

The viewer may be pardoned if the exactitude of this analogy escapes comprehension. How it is that one may go over one's life and correct, so that one's mistakes are not so apparent as they ever were, is an open question. Perhaps Ms. Hellman could give lessons. On the other hand any literary conceit concerning memory is appropriate as a frame for the film.

Pentimento, from which the story of Julia is drawn, is one of the volumes in Hellman's continuing autobiography (for which she is more certain to be remembered than for her powerful but now dated plays — some writers are born to be memoirists and anything which grants them the stature to record their lives is mere foreplay). In it she attempts to come to terms of truce with her memories of the two most important people in her life: Dashiell Hammett, with whom she lived 'on and off' for thirty years, and Julia, her childhood confidant who grew up to be a signpost on the road not taken.

The material of her memories of Julia is far more dramatic, at least, in terms of the screen. The relationship of the two women may be presented in a single sequenced action, action which conforms to the audience's conception of the thriller. Dealing with an ongoing relationship between two strong-willed people, a relationship which is never distilled into a single event, no brilliant moment of meeting, or of final reconciliation, is too great a challenge for the visual immediacy of celluloid. Bergman's massive failure Scenes From a Marriage is an object example of what occurs when such a subject is undertaken.

Unfortunately for the film, Hellman's relationship with Hammett cannot be excised. Lillian sees Julia so infrequently that any attempt to remove Dashiell's figure would lead to a jagged narrative line edged with numerous soliloquies from Lillian. Hammett's primary purpose in the film is to give Hellman someone to explain things to and emote at. This leaves Jason Robards (playing Hammett) standing about looking avuncular, making the occasional laconic statement, and giving off a strong sense of having been dragged unwillingly into the film.

The film-makers have, sadly, felt themselves obliged to document the nature of hard-boiled romance. Hellman and Hammett drink a great deal, smoke more, deliver crisp one-liners at one another, and generally act self-sufficient. This is not enough. It is little more than a playing out of clichés culled from the Bogart-Bacall catalogue.

Nor is the portrayal of Hellman the neophyte writer any more successful. Predictably she tears paper from the typewriter, chain smokes, kicks the wastebasket, takes long walks along the beach, tosses her typewriter out the window . . . You can supply the rest.

One scene can carry all the importance of a lifetime.

Lillian's relations with Julia are far more central to the film but they too are presented in conventional terms. The flashbacks to the two as young girls dining in the fine old English family home with Julia's grandparents may well be true to Hellman's experiences, but they are in no way differentiated from the hundreds of other such scenes which decorate movies. There is no apparent attempt to particularise. The scenes are intended as signs and are nothing more.

It may be that this background of clichés and signs is intentionally laid out to force the central action into higher relief. Julia (Vanessa Redgrave) has gone from Oxford medical school to Vienna to study under Freud. She has been a socialist since puberty but her position in mid-thirties Austria provides a sphere in which her political instincts are spurred into action. She becomes a member of the anti-Fascist underground, is injured in a Nazi Youth attack on the university, loses a leg and is driven further into the movement. Dodging the death lists becomes a way of life.

Lillian remains safely in America writing The Children's Hour. She receives occasional letters from her friend, and is forced to defend Julia's socialism from her New York socialite friends.

She makes two pilgrimages to Europe. During the first she discovers Julia in hospital after the battle at the University. On her second she receives a communication from one of Julia's fellow cell members, Johann, who asks Lillian to be a courier for a shipment of Julia's money which must be delivered (to serve for bribes) to Berlin.

Hellman is Jewish and the prospect of a trip through Nazi Germany is not fraught with sunshine and scenery. The conflict is between her duty to her friend (which is coupled with a vague sense of the rightness of Julia's cause) and her fear for herself. The film-makers simplify the decision by tossing in a girlhood flashback in which Julia's bravery is set against Lillian's fears. At that point Lillian disappointed her friend but Julia had said that it would not happen the next time.

It doesn't. Hellman accepts the mission and is sent on a train journey which is a triumph of film suspense. The entire audience knows that Hellman survived the ordeal yet Fonda's acting coupled with the director's (Fred Zinnemann) perfectly paced evocation of rail claustrophobia sends each viewer's fingernails between their teeth.

But it is not the suspense which grants the film its value. Lillian's journey to Berlin leads to a scene in a trainyard cafe with Julia. When stripped of the obligatory movements of the plot (Lillian must transfer the money, and Julia must instruct her on how to leave Berlin) the scene is extraordinarily brief. It is, however, one of the most brilliantly realized moments in the film. If Suzanne Langer is right, and all that validates a work of art is its ability to crystalize feeling, then this scene — simply two women talking at a cafe table — may be employed as an example of film as art.

The focus is on Lillian who, at that moment, is confronted by a dear friend whom she can no longer understand. The contrast between Hellman the writer, the toast of New York, and Julia the unknown, doomed underground socialist, is stunning. And Lillian feels it more than any member of the audience can. Julia is what she might have been but can never be — in that moment perhaps, she understands Hammett's decision to abandon writing. It is one of those moments when you realize that the person across from you, no matter how dear they are, has gone beyond anything you will ever do, a moment of self-awareness which is also an admission of failure.

What remains of the film seems an unnecessary epilogue which betrays its contrivedness at every turn. The moment for which the film exists has passed. It's all downhill. Without that one scene Julia might have been a more unified, coherent movie; it's portions would not have been revealed in all their staginess. Without that moment I would probably have written a more favourable review. And without that moment the film would be worth nothing.

Jane Fonda as Hellman: nightmares of a childhood friend gone on.

No insight, just silliness

Maybe it's me. Maybe I take theatre too seriously. Maybe I should be able to say that one ketchup-squirting and egg-throwing battle doth an entertainment make. Maybe I just wouldn't recognize a good spoof if Monty Python hit me with it. But it will take more than a few publicity innuendoes or harsh theatre gossip to threaten me into thinking Carol Bolt's new play Desperados, which opened at Toronto Free Theatre last Wednesday, is a worthwhile theatre experience, one even that Bolt herself could be satisfied with. If its goal was to recreate some of the tension and violence between the idealism of the 60's and the reality of everyone's lives, as I suspect, then it fell just short of being an upsetting disaster.

The mysticism, passion, strange idealism and search for a sense of purpose in the 60's should be treated as a subject for drama with the utmost sensitivity and caution. Yet, in TV dramas, newspaper articles, play revivals and now Desperados, it is handled superficially. There hasn't been time's objective distancing powers and the following years haven't established a clear quality of their own, so that we can say we are something now that we weren't then. The problem that plays like Desperados face is that this era's dynamism still stands strong. It is an era that can defeat its own clichés by laughing at them first. No comparisons with silly gangster movies or simple philosophical equations of idealism vs. reality can face the myth that the 60's is slowly becoming.

If Desperados had been a play composed entirely of lines like "life is not a gangster movie", "You can't tell where the late show stops" or "something about a wounded man makes politics more sincere", then Bolt could have had us at least chuckling at our naivete then. Bolt is a serious playwright, however, and she must have seen something in these clichés that required a good dramatists voice. But the play doesn't live up to this implicit promise. The young filmmaker Wylie is not far enough from a real person to be a stereotype and not close enough to humanity to be sympathetic. He becomes, like Theo the gangster and Ruby the movie star, a silly nothing. And silliness, as opposed to comedy or camp, is deadly in theatre.

There is another sign that this play is just not ready for the stage. (Although Martin Kinch's dragging direction, particularly when Theo makes his lyrical exit to his death in the apartment below, wouldn't help any playwright.) The basic dramatic problem of establishing how characters got where they are and why they are there is handled by Bolt through the simplistic, and in this case, offensive, device of having them tell each other. Wylie says to Ruby "when we met in New York." Ruby tells Wylie (and the audience) that "we came from New York to Toronto in your Volvo." Etc. That part certainly can't be explained away as a send-up.

The play would have been better if they shut off the TV.

Although I wasn't an enthusiastic admirer of Bolt's recently staged play One Night Stand, I did feel that it dealt with an intriguing facet of paranoid city life and did it dynamically and in many places lyrically. Desperados, because it deals with a more complex problem, needs at least the same dynamism and bravado as One Night Stand, if not a lot more insight.

Difficulties overcome in massive production

Aristotle's contentions that imitation is both an intuitive and pleasurable response in man was given full testimony this past weekend when over five hundred amateurs, academics and students of drama took part in the dramatization of Biblical history as recorded by an unknown medieval author in the York Cycle of mystery plays.

The revival of the fourteenth century texts was certainly an important event in theatrical history since the last time all forty-seven episodes were staged was 1548. More than just an exercise in esoterics however, the two day event became an any downpour would have been. The whole purpose of the play's revival — the creation of the pageant wagons' procession — was abandoned with the move inside. While any indoor facility would have lessened the intimacy and spontaneity of a natural setting, an alternative location such as the Varsity hockey arena would have at least salvaged the dynamic staging of the cycle.

Despite the almost overwhelming problems encountered in the production, the end result was a spectacle of no small means. The delicate balance of secular humour and the solemnity of the liturgy, the juxtaposition of convincing, realistic character portrayals with the outrageous antics of the devils, and the effective combination of intricate stage devices and the evocation of the text was achieved in very few of the plays. Many more excelled in one way or another — the Creation plays by the Centre for Medieval Studies, Noah and the Flood and The Harrowing of Hell by U of T's Drama Centre, The Conspiracy by Ohio State University, Christ Led Up To Calvary by Cornell University and The Crucifixion by Erindale College — are all worthy of mention. The didacticism of fire and brimstone preachers often proved perfectly fitting to the text and proved capable of overcoming the often dull and awkward performances of religious communities. Other amateur groups discovered truly inventive solutions to performance problems (the parting of the Red Sea was symbolized by the waving of red felt banners).

The masters were not to be outdone however, as the final play was magnificently staged by PLS and Records of Early English Drama. The medieval experts, in an exemplary performance of The Last Judgement, coerced the sun to throw its waning light across the gilded angels amidst the almighty decess of the Resurrected Christ.

extensive collaboration between religious communities, local artisans, and university groups who, as a modern equivalent to the medieval craft guilds, were responsible for producing a play apiece thus duplicating the format of the York performances.

The historical significance of the performance of the Cycle necessitates an analytic review of some kind, but several factors make such a task difficult, the most obvious one being the enormity of the material involved — it took roughly twenty hours for the performance of all forty-seven episodes.

A second and perhaps more important consideration in terms of a critical approach to the plays lies in the fact that the prime motive for their staging was not an aesthetic one. To criticize the lack of theatrical prowess of the various church groups whose participation in the cycle centered around the celebration of religious beliefs or a tribute to patron saints (for example, The Woman Taken In Adultery was performed by the Church of St. Mary Magdalene's to judge according to standards which have no application to the groups themselves. Certain comments do need to be made however, both to herald accomplishments and to point out problems which should not go unmentioned.

Having seen past medieval plays by Poculi Ludique Societas (PLS), the group co-producing the York Cycle, the discovery that the mystery plays were not being performed in the original Middle English came as a surprise and a disappointment. Authenticity was seemingly eschewed in favour of more practical considerations. It became apparent however that most of the amateur performers had difficulty with even the modern edition of the verse, demonstrating an inability both to grasp and to convey the meaning of the language. Such an abuse of the plays' poetry could not have been much worse even in the more complex original language, and the once in a lifetime opportunity of hearing the archaic verse come to life by those few actors who could have accomplished this task should have been exploited.

A more serious complaint against the actual production of the York Cycle lies in the failure of the plays' co-ordinators to provide a more suitable alternative performance space in the event of inclement weather. While Convocation Hall offered shelter from the torrential rains during most of Saturday's activities, it was almost a more oppressive environment for the festive atmosphere of the medieval cycle than

'Tators are heavy metal but no Kiss

Contrary to popular belief, the Dictators are not another punk rock band. The audience, however, for the Dictators' Monday night El Mocambo gig was largely punk. Present were Natsee Dog and Freddy Pompei of the Viletones as well as members of the Poles, the Dishes, and Teenage Head.

The Dictators sound is rooted solidly in 60's heavy metal snarls of the Who, MC5, and the Stooges. Where they differ from most groups in the same genre is that they attempt to combine heavy metal and wit. It's with this goal in mind that the Dictators have been able to produce such classics as:

*My favourite part of growin' up

It's the price you've got to pay
For eating burgers every day* and

On stage Handsome Dick Manitoba (nee Ritchie Blum) is the centre of attention alternating lead vocals with writer-keyboardist Adny Shernoff and generally keeping the crowd laughing or swearing.

"How many of you got the first album, 'Go Girl Crazy'?" asks Handsome Dick. When a smattering of applause and cheers break out he holds out his hands and replies . . . "Good. Here's your money back!"

The Dictators went through an hour and a half of well received rock 'n roll with guitarists 'Ross the Boss' and 'Top Ten' trading some hot licks. Visually, there was enough going on onstage to hold the audience's attention, but they're no Kiss. They were greeted with loud applause (mostly by the punks) when they returned to do an ear-shattering version of the old Stooges tune "Search and Destroy" for their encore.

The Dictators are an up-and-coming band that are just starting to receive some of praise that they deserve. They plan to take their heavy metal madness to Europe for an extended tour. Although the Dictators haven't yet received a lot of recognition, as Manitoba told me after the show . . .

I am the Handsomest Man in Rock 'n Roll and I shall prevail.

I swore at all costs not to use the word 'bizarre' when reviewing Frank Zappa's concert at Maple Leaf Gardens on Sept. 29. Up until that night that had seemed to be his catchword, along with 'intelligence'. The word that night was vulnerable. Most guitarists look that way anyhow when out from behind their guitars.

That of course is the clue to the disappointment of the reviews the next day. Frank was pretty normal, offering only his tightly performed music with none of the trademark black-humour antics. Gone were the days of rubber-hosed camels squirting whipped cream.

Instead he gave us a straightforward concert of the most successful and satisfying fusion of rock and jazz techniques that exist today. Zappa started off with "Peaches en Regalia", and old standard of his. I was delighted with the clarity of the sound in this instrumental and thought that he had licked the sound problems of that cement cauldron. When he moved into "The Torture Never Stops" from his Zoot Allures album and took up the vocal, I unfortunately could understand the echo from the wall better than the sound from the stage. The Gardens triumphs.

After the intermission Zappa resumed the performance with a slow blues tune, giving his band the opportunity to solo. To nobody's surprise they were very energetic but absolutely standard in their solo attacks, making Frank seem all the more inventive. Blues is a pretty tired form anyway, and only he showed that there was something left to do with it by soloing heavily in the bass register — a supposed no-no when you are already accompanied by a bassist.

That became the tone of the evening. The band competent and energetic, Zappa amazing but most accessible.

Zappa knows how to play the crowd almost as well as the guitar. For the second encore he brought out Flo and Eddie for some Tear Began To Fall type of material providing a sort of rapid-fire 200 Morels. The only real disappointment of the night was his failure to persuade Ringo Starr to come onstage to do his excellent Zappa imitation. The concert was not a monster, but certainly fascinating.

Adversary legal system gets critical and stylistic abuse

Injustice for All by Anne Strick
G.P. Butler, $15.00

Two problems with Anne Strick's book. One: it is by any measure one can apply, an abominably written book — in acknowledgments at the front, she thanks "Philip Donne" for his stylistic comments; my advice to Mr. Donne would be to sue — he should be able to collect handsomely if he can prove that her style owed nothing to his comments.

Lawyers are not children. Nevertheless, adversary conceptualization forces childhood's orientation upon them. That conceptual method requires those who enter its bonds to order litigious experience in essentially single perspective, polarized terms. It requires them to reduce experience to either-or simplicities — as do children.

To that reduction, however, the legal profession brings something extra: the adult's intention, knowledge, and resource. It is a potentially malign combination.

The prose is about as easy to take as fingernails scraped across a blackboard. Atop the legalese of "adversary conceptualization" is heaped "childhood's conceptualization", which is at once jargon and barbaric syntax, and represents a common linguistic tic throughout the text: "polarity's rule" is another example; add to this the gothic melodrama of phrases like "those who enter its bonds" and it becomes apparent the style is by several degrees worse than the ordinary bad prose of most sociopolitical documents such as this one. To put up with that ordinary bad prose when educating oneself in social, political, psycho-philosophical or legal matters is quite enough — to add to that the melodrama and sloppy (or, to be generous, baroque) syntax of Injustice for All, and a reviewer is likely to find himself toiling in the bonds of nausea's gush.

Besides this she attacks the adversary legal system, the entire concept of the adversary legal system, in a style which replicates adversary legal methods. She obscures facts and nuances, substitutes charges for arguments in many cases, accepts uncritically those arguments she can press in her favour, but will not so much as acknowledge the possible good intentions of those she argues against. She comments, often, negatively and copiously on every authority quoted who defends the adversary system (and since she rarely quotes more than a sentence from any author, God only knows what liberties are taken with context in her selections) but lets pass in silence every assumption of those who attack the system — a technique which, in a book as closely indexed as this, creates a habit of mind in the unwary reader of accepting uncritically those remarks which go unchallenged, and only absorbing those remarks critical of her adversary, the adversary legal system. This is much like a technique for selling I heard advised on a tape concerning how to improve your gifts as a salesman. It advised that you suggest to a potential client that he draw up a list of reasons "For" and "Against" buying a product. While he is listing items "For", you help him all you can; when he begins to list items "Against", you shut up.

A second tactic is to bury the discussion in footnotes. Every chapter of this book has some 200-odd footnotes, duly indexed at the back of the text — each page bristles with one-sentence, half-sentence and single phrase "references" the cumulative effect of which is to cow any protest the reader may muster against Strick's assumptions — because, after all, she has so apparently "read" her subject. But what does she really prove, by all these glancing references to a thousand works, concerning her scholarship — especially in combination with her method of selectively challenging only those assumptions which argue against her own bias?

Still, if one can read past the biases and close one's ear to the style, there is a valid challenge offered against the adversary system — but the only part of the text which is worth reading carefully and thoroughly in spite of barbarities of style, is the last section in which some alternatives to the adversary legal system are proposed. These, though stated more dogmatically due to author's bent, than I like, are sound enough in the main, and stimulate a few ideas about ways and means to renovate the legal system in search of social justice.

Cheap Trick: Slick schtick clicks

Foregoing my fave TV show, Charlie's Bimbos, I ventured to the El Mocambo on Wednesday night. There I sat, doodling in tabletop scum, parched of throat and damaged of brain, when the waitress brought my jug of draught. My good nature getting the better of me, I tipped her a nickel. Bending down gracefully, she cooed in my ear: "Cheap prick". "No, no," I corrected her, "Tonight's group is Cheap Trick."

Cheap Trick is an American band, just now beginning its first major assault on the ears and wallets of John Q. Rockpublic. Leader of the group is guitarist Rick Nielson (winner of the Bowery Boys look-alike contest) who goes through about ten to fifteen thousand guitar picks each show (conservative estimate), and is continuously tossing, spitting and bouncing them to the audience (it's not only cheaper than tossing souvenir guitars, but is also easier on the fan's pockets. Such is the Nielson genius).

Adding to the group's mondo bizarre image is the chain-smoking drummer Bun E. Carlos, a Venezuelan, whose ongoing imitation of a U of T accountancy student would be flawless, save for the fact that he smiles and moves around occasionally.

This heavy metal humour tag team is offset by singer-rhythm guitarist Robin Zander and bassist Tom Petersson, both of whose moves and looks earn them the classic rockstar label. Both are suitably whimpy looking (in this Framptonized age), yet have enough baby face killer potential to create that subtle aura of violence found in a really great band.

The high energy CT show opens with "Hello There", a number that lets the poor suckers sitting in front of the amps know that it's going to be one of those nights; what with a guitar line reminiscent of 10 million little geeks scraping your eardrums with knitting needles, and a power vocal that burns punk-rockers at their own game. The songs ranged from this and others of the scare-the-safety-pins-off-the-punks ilk, some standard melodic metal mung, a sort of heavy metal disco song, and even a Ted Nugent meets the Archies type tune called "I Want You to Want Me".

The standard CT song goes something like this: Bun E. begins whump-thumping a toe tapping beat; Zander and Petersson then unleash the proverbial wall of noise and Nielson tears into the whole thing with some of the most God-awful caterwauling this side of kitties in heat. Many of their songs conjure an ominous evil atmosphere, and running through most of their songs is a strange sense of deja-vu, not ascribable to any particular riff or rhythm, but probably derived from the overall feel of each song.

Visually, the group is equally diverse, with a show not incomparable to vaudeville. Nielson and Carlos handle the schtick, with the former pulling an assortment of goofy faces, pandering to the audience with all manner of ginchy gestures, and generally twizzling around like a cheerleader at the St. Vitus School of Dance; and the latter sticking ciggies in his ear, using six foot long drumsticks and moving to the beat like a contented, chortling pumpkin. Meanwhile Zander and Petersson, the straight men, are giving a visual display of the "encyclopedia of Later 20th Century Rock Poses" which like all good straight acts, underscores the nuttier goings-on.

The total package is a hell of a great show, incredibly simple in presentation (no flashpots, lasers, smoke-bombs, not even a bazooka that fires flaming balls of dung over the audience's heads, which then explodes and rains shredded OHIP cards onto the crowd. But the best thing about this band is that they're fun. Me and my friends say so, So there.

SELF~INDULGENCE

War is hell; undeclared war is a special, internalized hell, known only to the participants trying to keep things quiet while carrying out acts of aggression in secret.

The war of which I speak has cooled somewhat, although one may expect a fresh outbreak of hostilities at any time. The causes go a long way towards explaining where that hell comes from, and what makes it so hellish.

This undeclared conflict arose from the many insecurities of life: mistrust breeds mistrust, orneriness breeds orneriness, and a lack of caution can make it all catch fire. While not exactly that which the historians would term a "powder-keg" — a metaphor that has always struck me as especially apt — there was ample opportunity, after the initial moments of conflict, for the expansion and propagation of hot air and acrid gases.

September 25, certain members of a group that I must call, for fear of reprisals, group "E", launched an incursion into the territory of group "V".

Group "E" must be treated with respect, owing to the fact that they have a strong-arm faction known as the BFC; they are affectionately referred to as the Committee for Brute Force. A youthful, and militant wing of "E", known as "frosh" has also been a source of concern to law-abiding citizens.

"V", on the other hand, is known by a part of its motto, "most feared". Within its ranks may be found a feminist faction responsible for some of its more energetic treaties and a guerilla cell variously known as Mario's Marauders or the Red Thumb faction.

The would-be powder-keg went up with a flash, a boom and a hiss on September 25th. "Operation treasure-hunt", a big operation carried out by "frosh" led to a number of disruptions throughout their theatre of activity. One of these was in the territory claimed by "V". In an act of limited aggression, indeed, innocent pillaging, certain "frosh-ites" eliminated some of V's effectiveness, by carrying off some of their communications equipment, and a timepiece. While the timepiece would seem to be a minor matter, to the "V-ites" this was the central issue; a rallying cry of "They want to hock our clock" could be heard for yards around their territory.

"V"'s feminist faction responded swiftly, albeit clumsily, in a communique issued in the party publication (which is free to all that will read it). "E" was charged with responsibility for the actions of "frosh", a not unreasonable position, but one that is like throwing powder on the burning powder-keg (except that it is difficult to get close to a burning powder-keg).

But once the powder-keg gets burning, it is often difficult to put it out; ask the firemen who have tried. "V" was heartily denounced, and rightly so, in a scathing report in the "E" party publication. Using irony, which is reputedly their main weapon, they accused "V" of shaking a red herring before everyone's eyes; "V"'s communique was seen as a report that the Reichstag was burning, and an exhortation to round up those responsible. But they, as well as "V", knew full well that the operation of "V" had not, as claimed, been disrupted by the raid by "Frosh".

So a $150,000 operation was not brought to a halt. Neither, as "E" claimed, was Mario (of the "Marauders") arrested. Mario was still there, even if to all appearances, "V" had ceased to function many years before.

But the slander against Mario's Marauders could not go unchallenged. This charge united "V" enough to permit a counter-attack, launched on the "E"'s centre of communications.

In the early hours of Oct. 1, a symbol of "E"'s strength, indeed, their virility, was carried off, providing a bargaining lever, to allow

"V" to regain its treasured clock. Known to insiders as "balls", these objects are supposedly in short supply to "E" and therefore should press "E" into returning the clock.

The party paper of "V", however, in a report to the theft, managed to pour gasoline on the powder-keg, which by this time has lost all resemblance to a keg, and begins to look more like a dilapidated bath-tub.

This open assault on the self-respect of "E" may succeed in finally getting that bloody powder-keg to blow up. Maybe "E" will finally confess that it hates the guts of "V". Who knows what "V" will do then. Will the BFC annihilate Mario's Marauders?

If you hear any explosions in the night, assume that the inevitable conflict has finally arrived. Get under your bed.

Letters to the review

Oops, wrong river

Dear Sirs,

Your article on the St. Lawrence Neighbourhood (Sept. 30, 77, Varsity) is appreciated in drawing attention to a development which is, as yet little known, although significant in Toronto's history.

However, there are errors in your description of project credits which should be corrected.

The project site plan was not by the Zeidler partnership, but rather done in association with the City of Toronto Housing Department, by a design team of recent graduates and Faculty of Architecture, University of Toronto.

The design team consisted of graduates — Barbara Dewhurst, George Friedman, Jurgen Henze, Andre Lessard, and faculty — Alan Littlewood and Joel Shack.

O'Noman flatulent?

Dear Sirs:

This letter is in reference to Brian O'Noman's review of Irving Layton's book, The Covenant (Sept. 30, 77). How is it that O'Noman managed to miss Irving Layton's message? He desires not to shock, as the reviewer believes, but to inform people of the horror of Christian anti-Semitism. O'Noman calls Layton's discussion of Jewish Persecution "familiar," as if he is bored of the whole topic. Is the murder of six million Jews trivial? O'Noman says that Layton is "chasing windmills."

The reviewer states that Layton wishes to shock Christians (who are different from "Xians," although O'Noman misses the point) by using such words as "fart" in relation to Jesus. What Layton is trying to do is bring his brother Jeshua down to earth — as a real breathing, functioning Jew.

Finally, O'Noman states that were he to see Irving Layton, he might "spit" on him as he passed. I am sorry to have to tell Mr. O'Noman that spitting at Jews is no newly-invented game.

After all the hoopla, were you one of the approximately 7,500 people who braved the rain to see a pageant play? Most of those who did see at least one say that the staging has far more potential than one would think. As far as the Review players are concerned, we had a gas, caught cold, and warmed up at a great party. Thanks to Jane Waterston of NDWT and Jeanne Johnson, who dug in and pitched for us, and Jane Crispin, Julia Turner, Ansley Tucker, Mary Shrestone and Jill Shefrin who were conscripted into helping.

The season is now rolling along and so is the publicity bumph. The Most Interesting Blurb Award goes this week to the International Society for the Promotion of Insanity, which has informed me tomorrow at 1 p.m., within the bubble-gummed halls of the New Yorker Theatre, 651 Yonge St., the fantastic realism theatre company's Abracadabra will be in residence. $2.99 for grown-ups, $1.00 for seniors and children, who don't have to worry about conventions. Call 653-3284 and ask why they laughed at Columbus.

At the Aladdin Theatre, 2367 Yonge St., 462-5200, The Importance of Being Earnest, Wed.-Sun. at 8:30, Ali Baba Sat.-Sun. at 1:30 and 3 p.m. Held over at the Factory Theatre Lab, Teacup Entertainments; 207 Adelaide St. E., call 864-9971. The Firehall has just unveiled their version of Abard Person Singular, which will run Tues.-Sat. at 8:30, $2.50-$4.50; 70 Berkeley St., call 364-4170 for reservations. At Harbourfront, 235 Queen's Quay West, a free performance tonight and tomorrow night of the Chetana Drama Group of Calcutta's Calcutta Musical Drama. This one-man entertainment will be played in Bengali but will include an explanatory narration in English. Free, at 8:30 both nights.

Gaulin's Mirage continues until Saturday evening; call 461-6551 for information, my notes are illegible concerning times. Beginning Wednesday, a mask-mime comedy presented by The Mime Company Unlimited, Intersection. Students $2.50; Wed.-Thurs. at 8:30, Friday at 9.

Grinding along, Open Circle's The Primary English Class, Tues.-Sun. at 8:30, but Saturday two shows, 6:00 and 9:30, plus a 2:30 Sunday matinee; tickets up to $8.50, call 471-6191 for details. Pepi Puppet Theatre, which, truly, can be fun (I know, Virginia, I'm childish) is into this year's child-centred puppet presentations, with a decidedly unappetizing Pop Goes The Fox but should be back on track with Magic in the Forest next weekend. K.M. Taryan, the impresario behind this theatre, seems best in traditional fairy tales rather than whimsy. Call 497-0916 or 920-8373; shows Saturdays and Sundays at 1:30 and 3, a deuce gets you in.

More usual fare? The Norman Conquests in repertory at the Phoenix Theatre, 390 Dupont, 922-7835. Call for play and performance times. Jack of Diamonds is underway at the New Theatre, and it's a shame it's so damned expensive. Call 364-5202 or the sales rep. at 651-0323 and ask why, plaintively. Review will be forthcoming soon; it's headed into a month-long run at New Theatre and then the Bathurst St. space. Theatre Compact's Wozecek continues, at that same Bathurst St. theatre, 25 Lennox St.; performances are at 8:30, Tuesday-Sat., with a Sunday matinee. Call 535-9996 for box office information.

For one performance, Brecht fans can see the Theatre Hour Company's version of The Exception and the Rule, about to be toured to Ontario high schools. At City Hall, Tuesday next at 7:30. Carol Bolt's much-titled Desperados has opened at Toronto Free Theatre. The place: 26 Berkeley St.; the time: an unusual 7:30 p.m. for previews, better check this one with a call to the box office at 368-2856. And Toronto Truck Theatre rumble along with Noel Coward's Private Lives at the Colonnade, running Fri.-Sun. all at 8:30 save for the double Saturday performances at 7:00 and 9:30.

PS. — I'd better do this now rather than later. Could all campus groups get a list of their intended seasons to us at the Review as soon as possible? We try to see the bulletin boards, and we'll gladly list you, but we're not mind-readers and won't accept responsibility for listing your production if details aren't available at Wednesday noon before the Friday Review.

art

We've never heard of these people but here they are. At the National Gallery in Ottawa that is, if your weekend promises to be that boring. The brochure of which this is a re-write says that one Mervyn Ruggles spent thirty-nine years restoring some stuff on paper which we should all be delighted to see. Drop in and see whether or not it was a waste of time. Also showing, Preli... big time Italian Renaissance person. Absalom killing somebody or other. Interesting picture, but then who can tell in black and white. Might be interesting in colour.

Acrylic paintings on masonite and paper. Sounds like a "home handyman" night course. Soft, delicate pictures of eggs and stuff. This from the promo blurb. If you like masonite, maybe you're into angelstone. Sandblast it if you don't think it's you. Yvonne Richardson (Keith Spicer would love the name) at Meeting Place Gallery until October 10th.

We don't know anything about art but we know what Eric Friesen likes on a two-part documentary on CBC FM on October 10th and 11th. Up against Rock 102 will be chatter from nine artists including Ronald Bloore, William Ronald and Greg Curnoe.

Agatha Christie Art show... Honest Ed's slightly west... David Mirvish Books on art (more than mildly Yorkville pretentious). Works of Tom Adams, a British artist who among other things did almost all the covers for the books of the late Dame Agatha Christie. It starts on October the 22nd.

Now here's a blurb that tickles our fancy. Jane Martin, New Paintings. At the Aggregation Gallery (where do they get these names) from October 1st to the twentieth. All we've seen is a fat lady in a yellow flowered dress. That looks intriguing. Maybe you should try some more.

Pre-med letting you down? Here's just the thing. "Lancets and Leeches: Medicine in the Nineteenth Century". Just the thing for the corporate MD whose career might span into the next century. At the AGO til Nov. 27.

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans! D.J.'s Tavern, in the Hydro Place at College and the University, has just recently adopted a new jazz policy. Apparently they found Dixieland too confining on a permanent basis. Starting Oct. 3, they'll be bringing in American jazz stars dating mainly from the swing era of the forties, backed up by local musicians. Music runs from 9 p.m.-1 a.m., with a $2 cover Wednesday through Saturday. Supposedly there's no cover if you're seated before 8 p.m. This week, Buddy Tate on tenor with the trio. Next week, the great Ray Bryant on piano plays with Dave Young, bass, and Jerry Fuller, drums. Ask him to do Ode to Billy Joe. 595-0700.

The Gap Mangione Trio continues their two week engagement at Bourbon St. until Oct. 15. At George's, the Ed Bickert Trio gives way next week to resident flautist Moe Koffman and the quartet.

Trumpeter Sammy Noto of the Boss Brass finishes off the week at Blondies, followed on Monday by the Andy Krehm Quartet (guitar), which incidentally will be taped on Thursday for a CBC radio show. Get your coughs, hoots and whistles recorded for posterity!

Yellowfingers features the Kathryn Moses Quintet (flute) with Ted Moses on piano and sax, until Saturday. The Bobby Fenton Quartet (piano) hosts the after hours sessions tonight and tomorrow. The club has not yet drawn up next week's listings. That could be a bad omen.

Tuesday through Thursday 9 p.m.-midnight, the George Boley Organ Trio entertains at BIC's Coffee House, 11 Yorkville. The group expects to blossom into a quarter any day now.

Cafe Soho, 334 Queen W. at Spadina, presents the Bob Brough Quartet (trumpet I think) tonight after hours, followed 24 hours later by the Edmonton Quartet (unknown composition).

On Saturday Oct. 8 Norm Amadio performs with vocalist Sharon Smith in the Copper Lounge of the Inn on the Park, 2:30 p.m. Sharon is a budding talent whose ability quite impressed this writer. She does a beautiful interpretation of 'Love for Sale'.

Free Concerts: Tonight 5 pm at the Eaton Centre, the Peter Appleard Quartet (vibes) will dazzle the shoppers. This Wednesday at Hart House, the Joe Sargeant Trio at noon in the East Common Room for the usual two hour show.

Disturbing Rumor Dept.: Blondie's is in trouble. More on this in two weeks.

Aerosmith will be at the Gardens on the 20th of this month.

This Sunday the immortal Iggy Pop will be joined by the legendary Ramones at the Masonic Temple. Line up early; the tickets are general admission.

Firefall, the band with those pretty album covers, will be at Con. Hall on the 19th. The New Yorker is bringing the electronic blizzard (I'm an English major, I'm allowed to make up words) of Stomu Yamoshi's "Go" on the 28th and 29th. Mr. Harry Chapin will be playing Massey Hall on Nov. 6 and 7. Chicago will be at the full Gardens on the 31st, and Bobop Deluxe will delight the masses at Seneca on Oct. 22nd. Tickets go on sale for that tomorrow.

The club situation for tonight looks rather bleak. Downchild is at the El Mocambo. They'll be followed by the Jan Hammer Group. Great band if you don't like music. The Colonial has Ether Phillips this evening, Larry's has Pockets and the Gasworks has Goddo. The Chimney is bustling with the eclectic presence of Cueball.

Meanwhile, back at the ranch, SAC is presenting Harpo at Dr. John's (U.C. Refectory) tonight. The cover charge should be one dollar. At Grossman's on Spadina, next Monday through Thursday, Mississippi Joe White and the Blind Lemons will be laying down some rhythm-and-blues-funky-country-jazz-honk for the price of a cheap draft. Now that will be worth waiting for. Good times.

paul

movies

Friday: The Revue carries on last weeks theme of European decay with yet more showings of La Grande Bouffe and The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie. The New Yorker (in its campaign to break the bad movies in one week record) shows two of this year's big-budget thrillers, Sorcerer and Black Sunday. The U of T Film Society has Clockwork Orange at Med. Sci. Aud. Tonight and tomorrow. Chabrol's La Femme Infidèle and La Tête de Normande St-Onge tonight and tomorrow at Cinema Lumiere.

Saturday: The Revue repeats. The New Yorker, however, has a program to amaze and delight. Their idea of a perfect evening begins with the ridiculously overrated lay-it-on-with-a-power-shovel satire of Network. This is followed by Downey's Putney Swope, one of the all-time baddies mentioned above — how the NAACP and SNCC let this one show without bombings is beyond me. At midnight, if you haven't been satiated yet, you may sit through sci-fi street-wars with A Boy and His Dog.

Sunday: Alas the agony of too much choice! The New Yorker shows no less than seven movies with Network and Nasty Habits (which may succeed in making the former look subtle) showing all day and a midnight program which offers Magical Mystery Tour, A Fistful of Dollars, The Groove Tube, Blackboard Jungle, and that classic of the L.A. sewers Them. Not to be outdone the Revue is showing Ken Russell at his best (Women in Love) and what should have been his worst but wasn't (The Music Lovers). The AGO has two tales of life in the lycee (or whatever) with Zéro de Conduite and Renoir's Rules of the Game. Innis Town Hall has its usual all day fare, cartoons at 2:00, Chaplin and Keaton silents at 5:00, and Garbo's Queen Christina at 8:00. Under Milkwood and A Doll's House at Cinema Lumiere.

Monday: Repeats at the New Yorker, Cinema Lumiere and the Revue. The silver screen is dark elsewhere.

Tuesday: Finally, the program Brian's been waiting for! A Bad Cort festival! Harold and Maude (which flopped everywhere except in Minneapolis where it showed for something like four years without interruption) and the great Brewster McCool (which flopped everywhere except in Mr. O'Noman's heart) which is the only movie to combine the epic techniques employed in Beowulf, Moby Dick, and The Ancient Mariner, with the contemporary screen. If anyone can't get there on Tuesday they repeat Wed. At the other houses (as if anyone will even consider them) The New Yorker has Catch-22 and The Ruling Class; Innis has the complete Adventures of Captain Marvel and the Science Centre has two real dogs W.C. Fields and Me and Gable and Lombard.

Wednesday: The AGO has a collection of independent filmmaker's shorts, this time focussing on abstracts. In this connection I would note that CEAC's The Funnell continues its Tuesday night series of independent films. The Science Centre redeems itself with two little-known examples of the new English cinema, Overlord and Frieda. The New Yorker, however, wins for showing Siddhartha which must be closer than Putney Swope to being the worst film of all time, and Stepanov which tries to measure down but can't quite. Avoid!

Thursday: U of T Film Board offers two from Mel Brooks, Silent Movie and Young Frankenstein. The New Yorker has Bergman's exercise in colour coding Cats and Whiskers and Russell's adaptation of D.H. Lawrence's Nude Chaps Wrestling by the Open Fire. The Revue begins to trot out its Truffaut collection with Jules and Jim. It's paired with Leanne Moreau's first directorial effort Lumiere, some people were impressed, but then some people think Bergman is a major intellect. The week closes out with Marcel Ophüls' The Memory of Justice, which focusses on the alternation of justice and guilt, national and personal, at Nuremberg and in the years following. Neither so penetrating or so even-handed as The Sorrow and The Pity, Memory is still evidence that documentary is a too-much neglected form and that statements may be made in film with intelligence and tact. Flowers on a One-Way Street, a black and white on Yorkville in '67, and Medium Cool, a pseudo-documentary on the Democratic National Convention in Chicago, 1968, with music by Mike Bloomfield, the mothers and Wild Man Fischer, at Cinema Lumiere.

Help Boxing Team

By GERRY NARRAWAY

The existence of the U of T boxing team is in serious jeopardy because of shortages and cutbacks in the Athletic Association's Budget. For the first time there will be no money forthcoming from the Athletic Association for the maintenance and promotion of the boxing team.

In the face of this crisis the members of the team have decided to chip in and pay the cost of travelling to and from tournaments in the United States. However, they will still be short the $500-$600 that it takes to run the facilities under Varsity Stadium.

Last year, Jason Lo of the U of T won the North American championship in Philadelphia. As it stands now it seems unlikely that he will be able to defend his title unless the additional money is raised.

In an effort to raise the additional funds the boxing team has been campaigning among the student body. To date their success has been minimal.

If you are interested in keeping the boxing team alive the team wants to hear from you. All donations are greatly appreciated and can be sent to:

Varsity Fund Boxing Team
c/o Dept. of Private Funding, 455 Spadina Avenue,
Rm. 305, Toronto.

No donation is too small. So help prevent the fine boxing tradition at the U of T from dying out.

Archers Are on Target

By BARB PALUCH

The weather played the villain as outdoor archery moved indoors. It was too wet and windy for outdoor shooting at Part 1 of the Guelph Outdoor Archery Tournament.

Returning for another year of shooting are Barb Paluch, Renate Brunscole, Paddy Duncan, Marie Maniw and Mary Wilson. The rookie of the team, but by no means a newcomer to archery is Julie Ford. Kathy Anderson returns as coach.

Duncan, Paluch, Ford and Brunscole combined to give Toronto

2,471 points. That was 50 points better than second place Guelph and quite a bit better than Western and Queen's.

B. Ballers Get Ready

By CODY

Sharon Bradley, U of T's women's basketball coach, expects shooting to be the big improvement over last year's team which posted a record of 2 wins and 13 losses. Bradley said many of last year's games were close contests in which U of T played well but couldn't hit the basket. "We were getting open but couldn't put in the shot. This year it'll be different".

Over thirty women tried out for the team and of the dozen selected, six were on last year's team. Bradley said the rookies look better than ever and last year's players have improved over the summer. She plans to emphasize hustle and a fast-break approach as a basic game plan.

The team's first test will be the annual York Invitational Tournament on October 21st and 22nd. The tournament will feature U of T, Ryerson, McMaster and York. The following week they play in a tournament at Guelph.

After the tournaments the team faces a regular season of 15 games. In the east Bradley sees the toughest opposition coming from Laurentian, national women's basketball champs for the last four years, and an improved Ottawa team.

In the western division she expects Western to be the most difficult opponent.

Coach Bradley shouts encouragement to her players.

First Place Is There For The Taking

By MICHAEL LEESE

By approximately 9:00 p.m. tonight the University of Toronto Blues should have recorded their fifth consecutive victory of the 1977 season. As hard as one may try to take tonight's game seriously, it is hard to overlook the fact that the Blues lead the Guelph Gryphons in almost every category: Both on offense and defence.

This past weekend the Blues had an easy time of it whipping a supposedly tough Windsor Lancer team 29-7, on a rain-soaked Varsity Stadium turf. Meanwhile, Guelph notched its first victory of the year by edging the pitiful York Yeomen 17-15.

Tonight's game may not be the most difficult for the Blues, but it's a crucial game as far as the final standings are concerned. If the Blues beat Guelph, they will edge closer to a first place finish in the Western division of the O.Q.I.F.C. The main task now is for head coach Ron Murphy to have his men think only of the game at hand, and not look ahead into the future.

Guelph saved themselves from disgrace by beating York last week, but still have the unenviable task of improving on their offensive point total. Their 22 points in four games is the lowest in the league, and against Toronto they are facing one of the best defences in the country.

Gryphons quarterback Craig Conklin has a respectable 46 percent completion record, and is fourth in the Western conference, but he has been able to complete only one of those passes for a touchdown.

Toronto's quarterback Dan Feraday has very impressive credentials thus far. Feraday has completed 39 out of 68 passes for a 57 percent average and a total of 592 yards.

John Goodrow has been a more than adequate replacement for the departed Marc Bragagnolo. Goodrow has rushed for 450 yards and is only behind Jim Reid of Laurier in that category. Led by veteran offensive guard Mike Steele, Goodrow has found himself holes that are bigger than the zeroes will be on the Guelph side of the scoreboard.

If the Blues' running game ever fails to materialize, they can always turn to Chris Kotsopoulos. He is by far the leading receiver in the league with a whopping 450 yards on 20 receptions.

The only bright spot this season for Guelph, has been Ron Lively. Lively is presently leading the league in kick-off returns and ranks second in punt returns.

With Guelph's impotent offence, Toronto's "General" Giordani and his troops on the defensive line should get a rest this week. The Blues' defensive backfield should have a field day with interceptions as Guelph quarterback Conklin can expect a massive rush.

Whatever the outcome of tonight's game, the playoff picture will be tighter than ever. The winner of the Laurier-Windsor match on Saturday, Western and Toronto all have a shot at first place so you can expect a battle right down to the last game of the season.

"General" Julio Giordani is the leader of the defence.

Track Meet Success

By ANDY AUZINS

Varsity stadium was the scene of the Interfaculty track and field meet Tuesday afternoon. Though spectators were a rare sight the competitors competed in their events undaunted, as the several close results attest.

The closest of those results was in the 10,000 meters where Bruce Kidd edged out Vic's Terry Goodenough. Though the posted times are the same at 32:28, Kidd was awarded the race on the basis of unposted decimal-second time as decided by the officials.

Another outstanding performance was given by New college's J. Ireland, a triple winner. Ireland won the 110 metre hurdles by a decisive two seconds and by three seconds in the 400-metre hurdles. He also won the 400-metre sprint and finished a close second in the 100 metres, one-tenth of a second behind the winner Carlo DiFillipo.

DiFillipo became the sprint champion, capturing both the 100 and 200 metres in times of 11.1 and 22.8 seconds respectively.

In the field events there was a rivalry in the jumping events between R. Pitler and Eric Little. Little, who is an alumnus, acted as the immovable obstacle to Pitler by posting better results (two seconds and a tie for third. For the purpose of team standings, non-affiliated competitor's results are disregarded and the other's bumped up.

A double winner emerged from the long and triple jumps in the person of A. Janusauskas. The high jump was close as well with the winner being decided by the number of attempts. R. DeMarchi took one attempt to clear the two meter final height while C. Georgevski used the maximum three. Both jumpers failed in their bids at clearing the next height of 2.05 metres.

In the shot put Grant Steins and B. Gillinghorn were clearly the class of the field. Steins, the muscular Latvian from New College, prevailed over Erindaler, Gillinghorn and won the event at a distance of 11.46 metres.

By HUGH STUART

On Wednesday, the Varsity Rugby Blues travelled up to Keele and Steeles to put their undefeated record on the line against the defending OUAA champions, York Yeomen. The Yeomen were ungracious hosts, shutting the Blues out, 21-0.

Team captain Joe Gilmour, realized that the game would be a tough one. Before the game he said, "Although York has lost to Western this season, they will be tough. Because it is a Wednesday, they'll have their strongest team since their players won't have the other commitments that might prevent them from playing on a Saturday. Plus York loves to beat U of T in anything."

York jumped into a 6-0 half time lead on the strength of two field goals. As the second half opened, the Blues finally showed the form that had resulted in 67 points in their first two games. Trailing 9-0 early in the second half, the Blues moved the ball to the York five yard line, but the drive stalled when the referee failed to play the advantage rule and a Blues score was called back. The penalty gave the Blues the option of going for a field goal or a try. Faced with a nine point deficit, coach Neil Sorbie went for the field goal but Doug Brent missed. While Brent had a bad day (0 for 3), the York kicking game accounted for 17 of their 21 points. Their other four points came on a penalty try.

Ercoli Scores Two In Win

By GREG REEDS

On Wednesday the Soccer Blues reaffirmed their bid to repeat as OUAA champions by downing the Brock University Badgers 2-0 at St. Catharines.

Surprisingly the Badgers played a defensive style of game and seemed content with trying to stop the Blues' attack. The Blues' however, were able to punch holes in the Badger defence and come away with the two-goal victory.

After a lacklustre first half, the Blues opened strongly in the second. Pat Ercoli opened the scoring after a miscue by the Brock goalie.

The Blues struck again five minutes later as veteran midfielder Tony Lipsey fed a beautiful ball to the head of uncovered Pat Ercoli. Ercoli had no trouble heading the ball into the net.

Brock could not amass enough offense to seriously challenge the shutout of rookie sensation Bob Simcoe. Simcoe was aided in his shutout bid by strong performances from veterans Mike Maida, Al Ratause, Pat Pitters and Pete Uremovich.

Blues have a pair of crucial games this weekend. On Saturday Blues host Queen's while on Sunday the cadets from RMC come to town. The Blues would appreciate your support on their drive to playoffs.

Profs await new promotion policy

By DAVID HEALEY

The fate of Assistant, Associate and Full (fledged) professors at U of T is now being decided by a new committee appointed by President John Evans that is meeting regularly to propose and recommend policies of promotion within the ranks.

Committee chairman Donald Chant felt it necessary to have a proper promotions policy spelled out. "We can't have a vacuum in this area," Chant stressed. He added: "The committee will deal only with the procedure for outlining appointments of Assistant Professors to Associate and Full Professor standing."

The two main requirements for promotion will be based on teaching ability and competent research achievement. Both of these requirements are to be equally considered, according to Chant.

"However there has to be a balance between the two," he said. "It's relatively easy to assess a professor with tenure on scholarly research and teaching ability because there is plenty of evidence around to outline his qualifications. But a 'green-horn PhD' has little teaching experience and this makes it harder," said Chant.

A candidate's willingness to serve on university committees and investigations and his service to the community as a whole may also contribute to his or her promotion. "But this will never outweigh the two main requirements," Chant said.

Students will not be allowed to participate in assessing a candidate's possibility for promotion. Committee member Chaviva Hosek, of the English department at Victoria College, feels this to be "absolutely appropriate."

"You've got to remember that we're assessing rank along internal lines," Hosek said, "and that includes scholarly achievement. Students are just not adequately suitable for this kind of work."

"Furthermore, a single student's opinion is not an effective guarantee of assessing teaching ability," Hosek stated. "A consistent pattern of evaluation is necessary and that is done only by investigating student opinion over the years."

When asked about the possibility of favoritism and subjectivity in considering appointments, Hosek's only wish was "to pray and hope that it doesn't happen." "It's hard to avoid though, and these are problems that we will always have in any human condition."

"Our purpose is to outline procedures that will prevent such conditions," said Hosek. "If someone does have a legitimate grievance it is hoped that they will know who and where to go in order to file a complaint as a result of our investigation."

Chant had a different outlook and said that subjectivity is not "wholly undesirable." "To come to a fair assessment, it's necessary to weigh the opinion of those in favor and of those against the candidate's promotion," Chant said. "Our purpose is to flounder around with opinions and hopefully, by weighing the pros and cons, come to a fair and accurate assessment. It's a problem every university in the world has to face and we must try to use it beneficially."

The committee has until November 15 to prepare and submit its report to the Governing Council for debate.

By ADAM KNELMAN-OSTRY

By a margin of two to one, the Budget Committee of the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) passed a budget containing a $21,000 deficit Wednesday night. The meeting, which went on into the wee hours of the morning, was heated and at times vicious. Those opposing deficit financing violently objected to various proposals by others wishing to see an increase in SAC services to students.

With a net income of $346,000, and the salary negotiations for office and administrative staff not yet terminated, the deficit amounted to over $21,000. Some believed that the budget could climb even higher since negotiations would render an increased salary decision.

"We're obviously not going to have a salary decrease as a result of these talks. You may find yourselves with a deficit in April of closer to $40,000," stated Governing Council representative Michael Treacy.

The budget, a critical one in these times of austerity, showed an increase in money allocated to some areas and a decrease in planned expenses to others. "The purpose of this budget is to define our priorities for the upcoming fiscal year," stated External Affairs Commissioner John Doherty. In an impassioned speech delivered as a result of a proposed amendment that would grant a 30 percent increase to the External Commission's campaigns account, Doherty pleaded with the council to mount a campaign against Colleges and Universities Minister Harry Parrott and his OSAP plans.

"We are facing massive cutbacks and extraordinarily high unemployment for students. We must mount an effective campaign against the Ontario government. The changes in student aid and the lack of job opportunities are for me top priorities and this council should set them at the top of its list as well," said Doherty.

The amendment was passed, in spite of Treacy's opposition. He believed that the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) and the National Union of Students (NUS) should foot most of the bill for this kind of campaign.

"We shell out a lot of money to these two groups. They should carry the largest financial commitment," he stated. SAC vice-president Brian Hill, however, was pleased with the amendment. "OFS and NUS provide an important link between students at U of T and across Canada. I'm happy the money was spent," he stated.

The Varsity's budget was passed after a discussion in which it was stated that even though the outlay was high, it represented a subsidy of only 3 cents per copy per issue.

The Services Commission suffered the greatest cutbacks. The council reduced the accounts allotted to conferences by 35 percent, Winter Carnival by 33 percent, ski days by 50 percent and the services advertising campaign money to zero. Treacy, who was responsible for most of these amendments, stated that it was "financially irresponsible" to allocate money in this fashion.

The council also decided to cut back the amount allocated to Community Legal Aid by 10 percent. This was rationalized by stating that legal aid was run by volunteers for the most part.

"I will always argue at Governing Council against any form of fee increase, whether it is for SAC or tuition. But it will become increasingly difficult for me to do so if we continue to grant ourselves these kinds of deficits," stated Treacy. However, SAC vice-president David Jones stated that "we must expand and continue to do so. Students have demonstrated that they don't want us to cut back. While I'm not thrilled with the deficit, we are going to need it, especially at this point."

Hill summed up the evening by saying that the argument boiled down to whether or not SAC was going to institute "policies of user-pay financed by higher fees for individual services, such as ski trips, films and pubs, or through a SAC fee increase taken at the source."

Library workers take offer

A "limited strike" was averted by the library workers' union (CUPE 1230) when union members voted yesterday to accept the wage offer made by management on October 5.

The offer accepted at the general membership meeting was "essentially the same as that offered before the strike vote," according to Frances Scovil, local president. On October 5, the union voted to empower the executive committee of the local to call a strike because of management's "poor offer."

The new wage offer includes an across-the-board increase of 6.2 per cent effective October 1, 1977, with $150 retroactive pay. Workers at step five of the union scale were offered a $200 lump sum and those at steps one to four were offered $50.

The negotiating team's position, according to Scovil, was that it "could not recommend this contract," but the alternative was "very likely a long, hard strike."

Members of the executive committee recommended rejection of the offer on the grounds that gains could be made as a result of "limited strike action" by a "strong and united" membership.

After much discussion, Scovil said, the local decided that it was "not in a position to take strike action" and voted "reluctantly" to accept the contract.

The vote was 236 in favor of the contract and 66 against it.

Grading policy tougher on Meds

In an attempt to "tighten the standards of medical education," the Faculty of Medicine is proposing sweeping changes in evaluation procedures, to take effect possibly as soon as November this year, according to a document released by the faculty.

Proposed changes in grading are of particular concern to medical students. The faculty is currently using the "Honors, Pass-Fail" method of evaluation. The grading system now proposed is an A, B, C, F system with respective percentages: 80-100, 70-79, 60-69 and 0-59. Percentage marks will be on office record but letter grades only will be on the students' transcripts. Previously, grades had been reported on office records and to the student as Honors, Pass or Fail.

A minimum 65 per cent average would be required for promotion to the next year, with 60 per cent as subject pass. Presently, both subject pass and year pass are 60 per cent.

Among other new measures proposed are clinical evaluations before the fourth year, and comprehensive exams at the end of second and third years, rather than after third and fourth years, as is presently the case.

In a mini-survey conducted among first and second year students, most students felt that the proposed grading changes would have the effect of increasing competition and academic pressure among the students. However, there was some support for earlier clinical evaluations.

In order to get feedback from medical students on the proposals, the student members of Undergraduate Curriculum Committee will be distributing questionnaires to all medical students over the next week.

The Curriculum Committee will be meeting on October 31 to vote on the proposed measures.

U of T deserves more

By KATHY CANTY

Arriving fresh from a meeting of the Federal Provincial Committee on the funding of University research, U of T President John Evans told the University Research Board last Wednesday that the value of research here is not taken into account when funding is based on enrolment.

Presently the university is allotted money on a per capita basis by the provincial government. This is called "formula funding" and is the method presently used when determining how much money each Ontario university should receive.

Since part of the cost of research involves general support costs, such as building maintenance and laboratory facilities, research is partially funded through this formula. Consequently, the imminent decline of enrolment in the 1980's could adversely affect research in Ontario universities.

Evans indicated that he would welcome any suggestions by committee members whereby the element of quality could enter into the support costs of research. Harry Eastman, Vice-President of Research and Planning, will be working on recommendations to the government to address these problems over the course of the year.

Tom Clark, Director of the Office of Research Administration, said that the "strict head count" method of funding does not reflect the quality and volume of research done at U of T. "If the formula recognizes quality rather than amount, it helps Toronto." While he did not deny that a new formula could hurt research at other universities, Clark felt that the present system does not do justice to U of T.

Another matter mentioned at the meeting was a $2.4 million grant the National Research Council has recently allocated to what were referred to as "national priorities." The money will support research in oceanography, energy, and environmental toxicology.

According to Clark, U of T can expect to receive about $250,000 from this program. A further $260,000 should be coming to U of T from the provincial lottery for major equipment in the health area, he said.

Clark recommended to the Research Board that a task force be formed to review the possibility of publicizing research at U of T. The Office of Research Administration has already experimented with this by offering a Science Centre lecture series, setting up displays, showing films, and handing out booklets to the general public. Clark said that if U of T does not make the public aware of its research projects, "we can't expect governments to keep funding us." Donations to research from the private sector which might result from this publicity "wouldn't hurt," he said.

Gala event for... new sidewalk

By CAROLINE CONNELL

The "Erindale Walk" was officially presented to U of T President John Evans in a brief ceremony late Wednesday afternoon. The walk, located behind UC, had been paved in attractive white brick as a sesquicentennial gift to the U of T from Erindale Principal Paul Fox, together with Evans, unveiled the commemorative plaque. In addition, Evans and St. George Campus Physical Plant Manager William Lye were given T-shirts bearing the slogan, "Joy is living at Erindale College," (which gave rise to the usual puns about what a nice girl Joy is).

In his remarks, Fox noted the difficulty of choosing an appropriate gift; the walkway was finally hit upon as being both attractive and useful, as most UC students will testify. He also quipped that this was a rare occasion of the "periphery aiding the centre."

Two trumpeters provided a fanfare to live the proceedings. Spectators were composed of a delegation from Erindale, several top university officials, and some passers-by.

The External Affairs Committee of the Governing Council is still floundering in a sea of self-doubt and uncertainty.

The Committee, for the second time in a row, questioned its own existence in the light of its scanty past accomplishments. It was stated at a meeting Wednesday afternoon that the unclear jurisdiction of the committee has led to other, more aggressive Governing Council committees assuming tasks which are conceivably in the territory of External Affairs.

Chairman John Cowan opened the discussion with a list of some of the committee's accomplishments. He cited the improvement of the Bulletin, the university administration's newspaper, and the Grad Post, as well as the approval of proposals establishing the Private Support Board and the constitution for the Varsity Fund. Cowan also mentioned a policy statement on community relations, and the appointment of a Community Relations Officer. The sale of U of T property at 188 Yonge Street to Cadillac Fairview was brought up, at which point Cowan said, "What's that, a body rub parlor?" He denigrated the sub-committee to examine the use of the name U of T as "much ado about nothing."

Vice-Chairman Sonja Sinclair proposed revitalizing External Affairs as it is a badly needed vehicle for public relations, "and without the public, we are nothing." She maintained that other committees have not taken over External Affairs matters. Sinclair said the committee could review the various organizations under its jurisdiction which publish pamphlets involving duplication and added expense while student handbooks beg for funds.

Vice-Chairman Sinclair also proposed that External Affairs revive the Office of the Vice President and regain control of the Office of Community Relations. The proposal was well received by committee members.

Cowan related that Norman James, former Vice-President for External Affairs, was forced to resign due to ill health in November of 1975. During the period of his illness the three departments which previously reported to James reported to university administrator Jack Sword. The arrangement worked so well Cowan said, that President John Evans succeeded in maintaining this set-up.

convincing External Affairs to a working sub-committee was appointed by the committee to examine these questions and report back by the New Year.

The committee voted to table a motion by student representative Chris Rogers to endorse a resolution censuring the four Canadian banks which are investing heavily in South Africa. The resolution was rejected by the Business Affairs Committee last May. External Affairs, for its part, was unsure as to whose jurisdiction such a motion would come under.

New smoking by-law confuses administrators

By HUBERT LUM

A sharp division marks the response on campus to the city's new smoking by-law, which either prohibits or restricts smoking in indoor places of public assembly, service lines, reception areas, elevators, escalators and retail stores.

Smoking and non-smoking students reacted favorably towards the legislation. On the other hand, university staff members called the by-law "irritating", "stupid" and "judicious".

Although student Charles Plant, enjoying his pipe on the third floor of Robarts, questioned the scientific validity of second-hand smoke as a health hazard, he acknowledged the potential discomfort of smoke to non-smokers. He said that since some students "can't stand smoke in the face," he was "in favor" of the law.

Similarly, student Carol Seeto applauded the by-law's defence of non-smokers' rights. "It's rude to smoke in front of a non-smoker," she said. Expressing annoyance at the practice of classroom smoking, she indicated that she had not asked any of those guilty to stop smoking.

Since the responsibility for the implementation and enforcement of a loosely worded by-law rests with members of the university staff, they are disturbed. Professor Peter Dyson of New College, who permits smoking in seminar classes when there are no objections, said, "It's crazy. It's well-meant, but impractical."

A Hart House employee, who asked to remain unnamed, thought the by-law was "ridiculous." Asked whether or not he would serve a smoker, he replied, "Sure. Why not? Look there's been no memos, no action, nothing."

At present, the university administration's policy towards the by-law is no policy at all. "We're all waiting for someone to make a decision," said Audrey Hozack, Assistant Warden of Hart House.

Explaining the inaction, Jack Brook, an assistant to the university's Vice-President of Business Affairs, said the university had received a municipal notice "late in the first week of September. We referred the matter to the university's solicitors. We're awaiting a reply."

In discussing the by-law's ambiguities, which seem to be delaying the process of implementation, Gordon Wright, Director of Administrative Services at the Robarts Library, wondered what buildings or parts of buildings on campus are "public".

In addition, referring to the fact that the by-law applies only to the City of Toronto, whereas the university extends to the boroughs, Wright questioned the relevance of the by-law to Scarborough and Etobicoke.

Herb Gladney, the university's Chief Fire Prevention Officer, suggested that the enforcement of the by-law would be "difficult." "It's like the seat-belt law. How do you enforce it?" Gladney asked.

Forestry dean backs seven course cuts

By CLAIR HUNTER

The plight of students in the Faculty of Forestry emerged as the hot issue at the Governing Council Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards meeting Wednesday night.

The subcommittee heard the faculty slammed for dropping seven courses, six of which directly affect fourth-year students.

Forestry Dean Vidar Nordin was present to defend the actions of the faculty on the grounds that there were no other alternatives available. Nordin said, "The loss of these courses was not from cancellation but because of staffing problems due to the loss of three professors."

Forestry students are expected to complete their course load with subjects from other faculties, notably Arts and Sciences.

According to Professor Forest Buckingham, "We want students to obtain broader perspectives and take courses outside the faculty."

The gallery of Forestry students in attendance was not given a chance to speak. However, the case was not closed as the next meeting on October 26 should find the debate widened to include their opinion. Many of the students, when questioned after the meeting, were reluctant to speak out "for fear of reprisal from the administration," they said.

The role of the subcommittee is changing, according to a member who wished to remain anonymous. It wants to assert greater influence, so that in the future similar situations will not progress as far. The committee wants to move beyond the "rubber stamp role" it has played in the past and assert greater influence on the nature of curriculum and standards.

Pick quick this year

By PHILIP LIBMAN

Pressure on the part of the teaching staff caused U of T undergraduates to change or drop "Y" courses from their schedules by September 23. The deadline was moved forward a week from last year's deadline (October 1), said William Foulds, Assistant Dean and Secretary of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences.

"A number of departments and instructors felt that the 'shopping period' for courses at the beginning of the year should be cut down to a minimum," he said.

"This was done in their own interests, to lessen the disruptive effect on the class and the students. Students coming in late can hold a class up," said Foulds.

"The deadline for coming into a course must be reasonable to the professor and to the student. The new deadline doesn't mean that under no circumstances can a student add a course. For the third and fourth weeks of school, if the department and professor agree, then a course may be added," explained Foulds.

This decision was made by the Committee on Standing of the faculty, which consists of the eight college registrars (of the St. George and Erindale campuses), four members of the academic staff and the Associate Dean of the faculty.

Norma Bliss, Associate Registrar of New College, said "the change was done as a result of pressure of the teaching staff."

It wasn't a bureaucratic decision, but an academic one, said Bliss. "There are serious teaching considerations here. Professors do not want students moving en masse to a course after three weeks without their knowledge."

The decision was made without any student participation but, said Foulds, "I think Dean Farquharson (last year's dean of the faculty) tried to get a full-time student on the committee, as last year there was a part-time student, but student membership is not automatic on the committees on Academic Standards, Admission and Standing."

OPTIONS CANADA

The more it changes, the more it stays the same.

The Trudeau government has a penchant for making a big splash when it wants to get its way. Provocative statements, lots of media hype and "charismatic" figures are the characteristics of this party. It's always very exciting to get involved in the bandwagons they have customarily put into motion. But we question the validity of one of these bandwagons rolling into gear here on campus.

This weekend the university is host to one of the national unity conferences that are springing up over the country like mushrooms after a warm rain. "Options Canada" is a national conference bringing in very high powered politicians, academics and corporate figures. "Alternatives Canada" is offering the student and youth movement counterpart to the first. Everyone can get into the act.

But what is the real motive of these conferences? Are we expected to believe that the statements made and the conclusions arrived at over the course of this four day unity marathon will make any difference to whether Quebec will vote for separation? Or is it simply that the famous names and influential figures will find their way into print a lot more easily?

Whatever one may say about the motives of the conference, kudos must be given to John Evans for his pivotal role in the hoopla. A president of Canada's most prestigious university, a member of the Canadian Task Force on National Unity and a soi-disant prime ministerial candidate, he is certainly the man to pull the necessary strings on campuses across the country, in the corporate back rooms for the requisite money for such an extravaganza and in the political caucuses for the presence of people like Keith Spicer and Claude Ryan in the conference rooms.

If bread and circuses are what the people really want, then they are certainly going to be glugged with the options and alternatives offered them. It's a long way from Rimouski to Convocation Hall, but what does it matter when the eyes of the whole country are watching?

So while the academics are busily arguing ethics, the politicians are assiduously making statements, the bankers and company presidents are putting the fear of God into everybody and the students are eagerly drinking it all in, the two showmen par excellence can congratulate one another in the wings. Great traditions should never die.

Bogue antizionist

Charles Bogue is to be commended on his "even-handed" approach to antizionism. Ostensibly remedying the lack(!) of literature critical of Israel, he supplies us with certain reports alleging Israel's mistreatment of Arab prisoners. We are further told that these are mere examples of a "steady stream" of such evidence.

This stream warrants some scrutiny. In particular Mr. Bogue cites a U.N. Human Rights Commission study, omitting, however, to point out that the members of this commission were Senegal, Sri-Lanka and Yugoslavia. These states have no relations with Israel, voted in the U. N. to equate zionism with racism and did not even bother to visit Israel to investigate the charges! Similarly, no mention is made of a committee sent by the International Red Cross in June 1970 to investigate the treatment of captured terrorists. J. Moreillon, head of the committee, concluded: "If there must be prisons, then may they all be like this one." Israeli prisoners enjoy full due process of law, and Israeli jails are open to inspection at any time. Military administrative detention, used to control terrorists operations (as Trudeau used Canadian emergency laws to control the F.L.Q.), accounted for less than 50 prisoners as of June 1975. Israel has executed only one prisoner — Adolf Eichman.

Mr. Bogue states: "I have a little doubt that Arabs are repressed in Israel as I do... that... mistreatment of Jews exists in at least some Arab countries." The barbaric treatment Israelis can expect from their Arab captors does not imply, notwithstanding Mr. Bogue's understanding of the nature of nationalism, that Israelis engage in these practices. I would prefer that the next time Mr. Bogue wishes to slander Israel he drop his guise of evenhandedness and speak directly. His appearance of impartiality might deceive the careless reader into believing that Mr. Bogue understands the phenomenon of Israel.

Hart House menace

Hart House, which has finally recognized women as an integral part of its athletic programme, is still not prepared to treat them as such. I would like to refer in particular to their women's change room facilities — or lack thereof.

Any female who is brave enough to have mounted the steep and treacherous stairs to the closet at the top of Hart House will have experienced the indignity of it all.

At times, and especially during inter-faculty tournaments, 20 or more women may be required to squish into the change room at once. (No licenced premises of the same size would legally be permitted to serve more than 10 persons, the government deeming it both dangerous and unlawful to do so.)

It has been observed that the women will often try to alleviate the crowding by heading for the showers. This only affects marginal improvements as the shower room has a standing capacity of 4. The 4 in the showers must then partake in a round of eeny, meeny, miny, moe to decide who will be allowed to hang their towels up above the water line. There is only one hook and that one is a door handle. The three losers must throw prudence to the wind and drop their towels on the sodden floor.

After drip-drying and dressing, many would like to blow-dry their hair. This, however, is the next closest thing to the impossible. The turn-of-the-century wiring will only permit one 800 watt dryer to be used at a time. Imagine the wait for the 6th woman in line to the socket. If, perchance, an uninformed female plugs in her 800 watts at the same time as another user, the room is immediately plunged into darkness.

At this point, someone is forced to leave to find a porter to re-illuminate the place, but the odds have it that she will not return. She is probably on her way to Toronto General Hospital in an ambulance. Is she the victim of another athletic injury? No, she is but another victim of Hart House negligence. She has slipped near the top of the darkened stairs and landed at the bottom with a broken neck.

Do we need to wait for an accident until action is taken?

Rugby discouraged

The U of T athletic directorate for years has been trying to squeeze out minor intercollegiate sports at U of T. On Wednesday night, Oct. 12th occurred one of the more obvious examples of U of T's uncaring attitude towards minor sports.

The U of T Rugby team had booked Varsity Stadium Wednesday night for a game against the U of T old boys. The booking had been confirmed several weeks ahead of the date.

The day before the game, Mr. Dalt White, a member of the U of T athletic directorate, informed Neil Sorbie, the U of T Rugby team coach, that the Varsity stadium field would not be available for the next evening. Mr. White's reasoning for not allowing the Rugby team to use the field was that part of it had been resodded and he didn't want it torn up before the Homecoming football game, upcoming on the weekend. Sorbie protested, arguing that the field was presently under use for a soccer game and secondly that the resodded part of the field was very small. Finally, Sorbie wondered why White had waited so long to inform him that the field could not be used. It was too late to warn many of the players that the game had been cancelled and undoubtedly some would be inconvenienced.

The next day Sorbie went to see Mr. Fraser, the athletic Department's head. He repeated the complaints he had revealed to Mr. White the day before. Mr. Fraser was not sympathetic to say the least. He maintained the Athletic Department's stance that the field could not be used due to the new sod. That afternoon the field was again used for soccer.

Many players were indeed inconvenienced by the game being called off. One old boy player had flown all the way from New York to play. Neville Nankaville, organizer of the old boys side, complained bitterly to Mr. Fraser about the callous treatment the Rugby team had been handed. Mr. Fraser's excuse was that the field had never been booked by the Rugby team, an outright lie.

Is not sport supposed to be for everyone, not just a privileged few? U of T's intercollegiate Rugby team puts out two sides; it only gets U of T financial support for one. The team has minimal costs. (It has no elaborate equipment to pay for, no overnight games, and it was already refused 500 dollars for an away game at Princeton Univ.)

If U of T continues to follow its discriminatory policies towards minor sport, eventually the only U of T intercollegiate teams left will be football and hockey. Perhaps it is time the U of T looked at the massive operating budgets for its major sports and compared them to the budgets of the minor sports. The obvious conclusion would be that if cutbacks have to occur, many more athletes will benefit from support to the minor sports rather than from increasing attention to major sports.

Hi, I'm Natzee Dog. I'm a punk rock star and I'm as cute as a button. Here's my latest song: "boys will be girls, you know how it goes...., so buy my records or I'll break your toes." Turn to pages 8 & 9 or you'll get a mouthful of shoe leather and you'll be picking up your teeth with broken arms.

Margaret Tyzack as Mrs. Alving in Henrik Ibsen's Ghosts, Stratford, 1977. Picture by Zoe Dominic. See page 6 for an interview with Ms. Tyzack and Tom Wood.

The granddaddy punk of them all: Antonin Dvorak and his piano concerto in G minor, opus 33. The boys from the Bavarian State Orchestra laugh it up with new rendition of a piece deservedly from the vaults. Creep on over to page 11 and you'll never sleep alone.

Motherhood and Circuses: Gross' alternative sculpture

The primacy of mothers and circuses becomes increasingly questionable on the road to "maturity" and tough-mindedness. Not so for sculptor Chaim Gross who visualizes mothers and circuses as both theatres of delight and mirrors of our own self-conception. (What?! An alternative to Henry Moore?) For bronze sculpture, his lighter-than-air figures are novel and intriguing, but his debt to Chagall is obvious to the point of plagiarism.

It is possible that the similarity between the sculpture of Gross and the master paintings of Chagall is merely coincidental, but even Gross's preparatory watercolours betray Chagal-like elements such as dream scenes, round flowing lines, and bright colour. Both artists acknowledge their debt to their mothers for love and inspiration. In a recent television documentary, Chagall stressed to the interviewer "I painted all my art for my mother". Likewise, Gross's Hasidic childhood in a shtetl in the Carpathian Mountains, and his mother Renee were central to such sculptures as Mother and Children on Unicycle, Baby Balancing, and I Love You Baby.

Maternal Affection I was the first bronze sold in Gross's new show at the Prince Arthur Galleries (continuing till November 8), and is certainly one of the most outstanding pieces. Beneath the overall playfulness and joy of the work, Gross introduces more jarring and intellectual elements. For example, the expression on the mother's face is oddly sour and distant. One feels uneasy at her seemingly careless balancing of the two children on the tips of her outstretched arms. In terms of realism, it would be an impossible stance.

But most striking is the mature development of the children's bodies; they are in fact miniature adults. This Platonic theme — that we are all expressions of one form "Man" — is elaborated by Gross to include a moral code for motherhood. Like the mother in the sculpture, the ideal mother must allow her children their individuality, since they too are expressions of the form "Man".

Between the pieces depicting acrobats, clowns, and jugglers, and those of acrobatic mother and child themes, are a scattering of Judaeo-Christian subjects. Here again, his figures appear to be somewhere between earth and heaven, as in Jacob's Dream and Angels Appearing to Abraham. But at the end of the gallery is a non-figurative work buttressed with combined Jewish and Christian motifs. Although it appears to be a Jewish Menorah, the candles are replaced with birds, which are the emblem of peace surrounding Christian holidays. Although this has been interpreted as a plug for Judaeo-Christian unity, Gross's intent is academic, not practical.

Although Gross is now comfortably settled in the Lower East Side of Manhattan, his past was a one-way ticket to a series of atrocities and deprivation. Born in East Austria in 1904, his adolescence was spent wandering through wartorn Europe, suffering severely until 1921 when he moved to New York and began to sculpt. The horrors of the First World War are no doubt partly responsible for his devotion, through art, to heralding the simple joys of human life. Through the circus and the mother we attain a heightened image of ourselves, and, (unlike war) a positive direction for ambition and achievement.

Gross is well-known in the United States and his larger-than-life sculptures are scattered throughout New York City, Berkeley, Kansas and the Jerusalem Hills. Although the Prince Arthur Galleries exhibition shows only his bronzes and some watercolours, he is also skilled in mahogany, ebony, beefwood, cocobolo and lignum vitae sculpting. As a direct carver, he represents a revolt against academicism in American sculpture which rejects the vision of 'the figure inside the uncarved wood'.

Gross's small bronzes have injected new life into an otherwise stale period in North American sculpture. Most sculptors depend on public commissions and have, as a result, relegated their art to a popular, made-to-order format. I highly commend the personal exuberance expressed in Gross's work as an art apart. However, his technique is still inchoate in that he stops short of actually putting his sculptures into motion. He is still burdened with the static when his works cry out to be either suspended or rotated.

In his exploration of the acrobatics of human life, clearly Gross has arrived at a point far above bread and circuses. The show is worth seeing to understand his sense of moral direction (try due north).

Frankness first at Phillip's Festival

"The best of life is conversation, and the greatest success is confidence, or perfect understanding between sincere people," wrote Emerson. "Sincerity is the highest compliment." While speaking with Margaret Tyack and Tom Wood at the Stratford Festival recently, what struck me most was her sincerity. Both actors demonstrated a genuine frankness.

Margaret Tyack is an incredibly easy person to interview. "People often don't expect me to be the way I am. They expect me to be far more classically orientated, grander, heavier and deeply serious," she said laughing. "I think sometimes I quite disappoint them." Laughter flowed easily during our conversation.

Tyack's climb to prominence as an actress, both in the theatre where she has appeared with the Royal Shakespeare Company and on television where her work includes such triumphs as Galsworthy's Forsyte Saga and Balzac's Cousin Bette, has not been an easy one. Her quietly courageous manner has been won through twenty-seven years of professional determination. She has had to fight to gain confidence.

"An actor can be talented but if he can't find work he just rots. It's a profession that can cause a great deal of unhappiness and frustration. Very unfortunate things can happen to your character." There have been "many gaps" in the Tyack career, a career fallen into "by chance", but, as the actress confided to me: "I think it's possibly been the best thing I could have done. I think I could have got extremely narrow had I become a nurse, or as I said to someone the other day in a particularly jaded mood about a scene, 'You know, I could have been a buyer at Harrods by now.' " Insecurity, both professional and personal, has forced Margaret Tyack to challenge herself. "I've always, for some extraordinary reason because I'm not a very courageous person, wanted to take chances in my work."

The uncertain nature of the theatre has opened Maggie Tyack up and awarded her a certain professional discrimination. "I find Shakespeare intensely difficult and I don't feel that I do my best work in Shakespeare. I much prefer what we call naturalism or realism. Although I love poetry and words, I don't feel I am able to touch an audience through the great verse as much as I am through playing something seemingly inconsequential... I prefer to create."

Margaret Tyack is an actress who knows her own mind. At one point she stated: "I must now turn down those heartless old boots (usually emotionally distressed older roles) when they come along." At another juncture she insisted: "Of course the theatre is a place for new ideas. Look at Ibsen. He was a clever old devil... He wasn't stupid enough to make Ghosts so completely obscure that in the end no one saw his play. He wrote it with compassion and humour... Anytime anyone comes over and beats me over the head with a mallet I don't actually become receptive."

Tyack's honesty is direct. "One thing I have really made my mind up about now is that when I am in the presence of academics in the theatre, a thing I admire very much, I am not going to be ashamed or apprehensive about saying exactly what I think. I do know, and this can happen at the RSC that the actress who would appear to be more articulate and says 'I feel this line to be superfluous and over-dressing to the overall emotional weight of the scene' goes down better with the directors than I do when I say 'This line is bloody boring. Why don't we take it out?' The director immediately thinks I haven't given it much thought. I may on occasion have given it more." The actress' quiet confidence guaranteed a certain sincerity.

Tom Wood was a different matter altogether. The young Canadian actor is intensely difficult to interview. "This isn't going to make any sense. I haven't made a complete sentence yet." Nonetheless, he is an exciting conversationalist with a good head on his shoulders. Legs fly. Arms twist. Wood's fingers are frequently found either in tight fists pounding out points or roaming through his awkwardly cropped hair. When laughter erupts, Wood's mouth fires into his eyes. Nervous energy explodes erratically leaving behind it an awkward sincerity.

I noted a certain caution in his movements; a caution instantly alerting me to a special presence far beyond surface characterization. Wood, the young man who played the repressed Alan Strang in the Canadian premiere of Peter Shaffer's Equus at the Vancouver Playhouse, appeared for all the world like one of the play's horses in check. The intermittently distraught resonance of his voice, "I think I have a terrible voice", reflects a sense of humility. The fascination derived from such overwhelming self-consciousness is infectious.

Tom Wood's professional career, unlike that of Tyack, has been relatively easy. "I've been most lucky, terribly lucky... You always have in the back of your mind that it (the luck) is going to run out." However, it may not have been as easy as he might like us to think. Tom described his Alberta family as being "not at all" theatrical. "In fact that was one of the biggest problems. I think one of the reasons why I went to university (Wood went to the University of Alberta where he graduated with a BFA), was my parents. That whole theatre world was so totally unknown to them. They always thought, well, at least he can teach" and all that stuff. It's always been something I've enjoyed." His determination to achieve specific career goals in theatre was set at an earlier age than most. "I went back home about two years ago and looked through some year books from high school" he recalled, "and where it said what you want to be it said 'actor'. It sort of startled me. I don't know why I would have made a pronounced statement like that."

Wood is one of the few young Canadian performers who has been successful in breaking the curse of regional isolation which retards the continuing growth of a national theatre in Canada. "It's awful" he mused. "When I first started out I did a few shows for Theatre Calgary. When I went looking for a room the first person I asked said 'We don't want theatre in Calgary... different picture.'" Wood has worked from Vancouver: "It's much more down home". He thrives on variety, "I want to keep bouncing around", and therefore maintains a healthy measure of suspicion when viewing Stratford's new three-year contracts.

Like Margaret Tyack, Tom Wood is a professional fighter. "I had been told Canadians couldn't do Coward, so I wanted to do Coward." But he is a professional fighter with a heart. "I remember during Equus, at a question and answer session, a girl said that she had been to the theatre many times but that she had never felt anything before," he recalled while clutching his white sweater tightly at the abdomen. The event obviously touched him greatly. "Whenever I read anything—I get a gut reaction." It is curious to note that although this young actor's weak bark often hinders his performance, "Robin Phillips threw away the role Richmond (Tom Wood)," Herbert Whittaker said recently of Richard III, his bite carries with it tremendous power. The sincerity of his emotional 'gut' response gives him a dynamic quality.

Perhaps the most refreshing aspect of my two conversations was the obvious affection and respect each performer had for the other. While speaking to Tom about his performance as Richmond, an experience which he described as a "nightmare", he said fondly: "Maybe it's because I'm a young actor but I remember every night coming home with Maggie (Tyack), in the car she'd give me little things, clues and things about getting on with it (his performance). She'd say, 'Just get on with it.' Things like that I'm not really used to yet." In a similar light Margaret Tyack realized that for herself, "constantly being exposed to the ideas of young people keeps you on your toes and makes you constantly question the things which in another society or another set-up you might say quite smugly and no one would question."

The most depressing aspect was, however, Maggie Tyack's constructive response to the Canadian Equity Association, which is determined to strangle artistic growth in this country by making the Canadian artistic community totally insular. I had expected a far more bitter response from Tyack on this issue because of her own difficulties in gaining entrance. "I can understand in many ways but I do think that if they close all doors, then the young actors who feel, and I've heard them say it, that if you make a success here you don't really believe it is the big time—if they do make it against no competition will they be any more satisfied? I don't think they will." When questioned about this Tom Wood nodded in hesitant agreement. "I aim to be an actor like Tyack someday" he said. Can he? He might, if we let him.

Jack deals wild card

Enjoyment is a privilege of the ordinary theatre-goer, a sensation the reviewer is entitled to distrust. Likewise thoughtless pleasure is taboo and singing along with a catchy tune is absolutely forbidden. The tin can of self-consciousness bumps along close behind the delight of illusion.

Since Jack of Diamonds, a 'musical medicine show' now playing at the New Theatre was a pleasurable experience for me, I'm afraid that my judgement is slipping as I am of giving it a straight damnation, just as the dailies did. It is a flawed show, surely, but it is infectious, humorous music and a good collection of stage business, mugging and one-liners all pinned on the washing-line of cosmic allegory. Not all levels work well with each other, and the hamming gets even painful at times. But taken as an elaborately staged vehicle for exuberance, it's very successful indeed.

Our evening of entertainment without the necessity of redeeming social value begins in Sunset, Yukon Territory, as the curtain is about to rise on the Jack of Diamonds Travelling Musical Medicine Show, a concoction of tired theatrical clichés (that's right, tired out, in 1900) used to hucksters the Jack of Diamonds Elixir. Unfortunately for the misfits who make up the cast, their mentor and leader of the scam seems to have deserted or been abducted. Without mounting terror of a lynching (for the cash-box also has vanished) they attempt to keep a show together, using bits indiscriminately from the Jack's show.

Each claims to have been reformed through the light in the Jack of Diamond's eyes — All the characters depend on the Jack of Diamonds, obscuring their real desires; all are clearly part of a protestant reformation.

Ultimately, with the realization that 'Jack won't be back' they attempt to live without artificial heroes.

Between the premise and the conclusion is an hour and a half of song, some dance, and a hearty helping of slapstick. If you don't like parody, and the extremes of the slapstick style, you're best advised to stay away. If you do like these things, by all means go. The show will still put certain obstacles in your way, but the pleasure is not diminished.

Chief delight of the evening, and the structural centre of the piece, are the songs by Phil Schriebman written in a variety of styles but leaning towards good old C&W and lyrical rock. Schriebman's ideas are good and his music more muscular than most of the atmosphere rock grafted onto recent Toronto productions, and the band he has assembled can really drive out a wall of sound.

Unfortunately, though the first (and longest) half of the piece moves in a sprightly fashion, the shorter second part shifts gears without being quite clear of its direction. The confusions are consistently bailed out by the music, not the dramatic flow. And there is an incoherent, blank space about ten minutes from the end which mars the progression.

"Disco dance or die, dude," exclaims saloon sweetie. "Flock off, flatulent floozle," retorts rube wrangler.

If you're independent enough to afford a movie ticket, and enjoy silent films and rock music — in short, if you're a semi-amnesiac hippie type — you'll rave over the show. Those of lesser energy, pocket-heaviness, or tripping ability won't agree. But Schriebman's brain-child is a different style of theatre than that you'll find elsewhere. His cast of Carol Forte, Dana Still, Geza Kovacs and Bob Nasmith are all wildly entertaining at times, and pall only in front of Schriebman's own psychopathic creation, The Man in Black.

The Wheres, Whyfors and Whocares of Hogtown punk rock

How to puke, piss and pucker: a wimp's guide

Premise: rock music has become so pretentious, so commercial and so safe that you're grandmother will tap her foot to it. What this generation needs is loud, raucous, violent music that will awake us from our Fleetwood Mac-induced stupor and offend our parents.

This kamakazi aesthetic attitude, spiced with a healthy dash of anarchistic political philosophy, has given birth to the phenomena of punk rock, or, if you will, New Wave music. It started simultaneously in London and New York, though in different forms. The main difference is that in England it is a working class statement, while in America it seems to be mostly middle class kids who play it. The Sex Pistols, the Ramones and the Dead Boys are some of the more famous practitioners.

In Toronto, the funniest thing happened: this city's own disillusioned avant-garde art college students and disinherited glitter freaks jumped on the bandwagon and voila. Toronto is now one of North America's punk capitals.

Toronto punk bands offer a wide spectrum of this somewhat limited art form. The nastier bands follow in the Iggy Pop tradition of self-mutilation and viciousness. At the other extreme, the more avant-garde bands play an intricate form of rock that is laced with witty, sardonic lyrics. The two extremes are held together by a strong distrust for established forms of rock and safety pins.

Toronto is littered with no-name bands who rip their T-shirts, strut around the stage like demented marionettes, and who call themselves punks. Yet they're all rich kids who grew tired of art school and picked up the safety pins. True punk is not an upper class hobby and Toronto "punk" is decidedly bourgeois.

Like it or not, the only real punk outfit in this city are the Viletones. Hearing Natze Dog and his boys may make you feel envious of Helen Keller, but rich kids fuckin' around they're not.

The band was formed about eight months ago by singer Natze Dog, alias Stephen Leckie, and drummer Motor X. For the first three months, they forgot about safety pins; instead they roved around town and beat people up. Face it kids, we're living in a tough world: Buffy of Family Affair o.d., John Denver smokes dope, and Rock Hudson is gay. These days a band that fights together, stays together.

The Viletones are a high-decibel quartet who rely more on volume than finesse. The trio of musicians are quite amateurish: Motor X and Kris Hate are a noisy rhythm section, while Freddie is a cute but balding guitarist. None of them are accomplished musicians, but then again the Monkees couldn't play their instruments either.

The centre of attention, however, is Natze Dog. He is the closest thing to Johnny Rotten that Toronto has. He is the main attraction, whether he crawls, spits, vomits or merely mutilates himself. Punk should be both violent and nihilistic; bedecked in black leather, Natze Dog doesn't give a damn about himself or anyone else.

The group plays their own material for the most part and it is both crude and loud. Usually the song centres around one guitar riff while Leckie screams his guts out. In the midst of this bedlam, there is one ballad titled "Possibilities" which amazingly enough is quite poignant. However, there are some nifty little extras thrown in for the older aficionados, such as Iggy's "No Fun" and the Troggs' "Wild Thing". The latest addition to their repertoire is a slightly bastardized Beatles' tune titled "Twist and Fuck".

While the Tones played almost exclusively at David's or the late but great Crash'n Burn, they've journeyed down to New York twice. The first time they played C.B.G.B.'s, where Variety described them as being "impressive in their New York debut". They just returned from a stint at Max's Kansas City, where they supported Wayne County. A second E.P. is soon to be released and in the meantime reviews have appeared in Melody Maker and New York Rocker. Maybe that means nothing to you Fleetwood Mac fans, but this band is going places.

The Viletones are by no means punks par excellence but they are a cut above the rest of Toronto's offerings. They are a trashy white rock'n'roll band who might just go somewhere. Your mother won't like them, but then again the snotty bitch probably hated Buffy.

poles

Amidst the vinyl jungle of the Toronto record companies, admitting that you write for the Varsity is somewhat akin to announcing that you suffer from leprosy. So it was with considerable trepidation that two crazy guys from the Varsity bandaged their sores and headed through the rain to visit the Poles.

In effect the Poles are one of the most successful of the Toronto New Wave bands. A single titled "C.N. Tower" is to be released next week, while they go into the studio in November to cut an album for Nimbus 9 productions. Before that a two week stint at C.B.G.B.'s is scheduled. So someone out there must like them.

The present five piece band has been together for three months and according to Doug Pringle, they keyboard man who is responsible for most of the music, it is the right combination. While musically they are far more accomplished than other

"I mean, my parents even like Fleetwood Mac, Elton John, Paul McCartney and everything that's on the radio. It's time for a fucking generation gap... something honest, we need more honesty"

Natze Dog

Toronto punk bands, the Poles have an ace up their tattered T-shirt: namely Michael Berman, female vocalist.

Besides being devilishly attractive, Berman writes the lyrics and designs all the Poles' artwork. She sounds somewhat like Patti Smith on the new single, but her voice is far more desperate than Smith's will ever be. A female vocalist fronting an all male band is always alluring, but amidst the raw power of good punk it is downright erotic.

Both Berman and Pringle expressed concern about the demise of such punk abodes as the Crash'n Burn and David's. The fraternity that existed among the early punks is no longer present, as one band strives to outdo another. However, the Poles like to think of themselves as being alone in their field, leaving aside all petty rivalry to concentrate on what they want to do.

An erstwhile member of Syrinx, Pringle is quite at home in the studio and he is co-producing the album. He feels strongly that there is an art to recording punk, for example combatting problems of hi-level distortion. The Poles' first album will contain no strings, moogs, or choirs; they want the same sound they get on stage every evening.

Suddenly the interview was over and two happy hacks returned to the rain-drenched streets of Toronto. Berman's last words were: "I'm into survival, I'm a star, I've got it". You had to be there to believe her. I do.

Remember those good old days of Crash 'n' Burn? Remember when the air was so thick you couldn't cut it with a switch blade? Remember how good the slime felt on the floor? Remember when Natze Dog threatened to have Motor Mike break both of Paul Budras' arms? Well, soon kids, all these memories will be yours on the soon-to-be-released Diodes single! Yes, those Thornhill rockers are well on their way to stardom now.

Just together barely ten months they have blown apart the tired old scene with some of the most incredible shit to the Toronto fan in a band's age. People(?) Magazine called them "totally irresponsible", yes, there's much more. Their debut was at OCA the beginning of February opening for those fab new wavers from NYC Talking Heads. As that late, great Review Hack, Lorne Macdonald said at the time, "If bands from New York imitate mixed-up kids, the Diodes imitate mixed-up bands from New York" and they do it so well.

But that was back in their Ramones days when lead singer Paul Robinson dared not move for fear the crowd would miss the Joey Ramone impression. Then there was the battle of the Colonial where the Diodes had to contend with Mafia thugs armed with baseball bats and two-by-fours.

And when there was no where else to play they made their own club. The Diodes, along with Toronto's most famous nobody, Ralph Alfonso, put together the legendary Crash 'n' Burn in the trashed basement of the CEAC building on Duncan Street.

Those steamy nights in late August saw the band at its best. John Catto's guitar sounded like a thousand breaking windows; Paul spat out the vocals like pieces of cracked teeth as he careened around the stage, bumping a guitar here, knocking over a cymbal there. Meanwhile, Ian Mackay, John Hamilton and John Corvete (John Corvete, the bass player left the group just after the weekend with the Boyfriends leaving guitarist Ian to handle bass) made up the tightest rhythm this side of a good hammer-drill. They do dynamite covers of "Nothing Will Change the Shape of Things to Come" and "Red Rubber Ball."

Now, here's the news. The Diodes have signed a two album recording contract. Their single is on the way and they have recorded enough material for the first album. Although there is not a date set for the next TO gig, rumour has it that the boys will be taking a bus load of Diodes enthusiasts down to NYC with the return to C.B.G.B.'s (where they were in June) at the end of November. We can probably expect a Diode homecoming show on their return.

curse

The Curse, who bill themselves as the World's Oldest Disease, were "created out of a vacuum" 2 or 3 weeks before their first gig fronting for the Viletones at the Crash 'n' Burn on June 3 & 4. Their biographies are pretty sketchy. Mickey Skin, the lead singer grew up in Kensington Market area, sisters Julia and Anna, the guitarist and the bassist Trixie Danger and Dr. Bourque were raised on Army bases across Canada. The only fact I got about Patzy Poizon, the drummer, is that she lived in a car for a year when she ran away from home.

The Curse started when Mickey Skin got bored with dancing and received some encouragement to front a rock band. She threw together the band with old friends for the C'n'B date. They share the distinction of being one of three all-female punk bands in the entire scene, the other two being the B-Girls and a British band called The Slits.

Like most punk bands they are in desperate straights because they can't find a place to play in. Schubert's Cabaret closed their doors to punk after a few rambunctious fans of the Curse had a little too much fun. The Curse were banned from the Outrage show by Teenage Head's manager. David's is closing its doors on punk and reverting to a disco. However, the Curse did get one break when they were allowed to do a guest set at CBGB's when Toronto punk invaded New York last spring. By their own reckoning there are 17 new wave bands with no place to play. Two possibilities are the Chimney and the Shock Theatre. The Curse have a date at Kalumet College, York University on Friday, November 18.

"My favourite group of all time is the shondells"

Natzee Dog

In spite of their macho put-on the Curse would like it known that they are not dykes. Mickey Skin proved most articulate discussing their original material ("Teenage Meat", "Eat Me", "If It Tastes So Great Swallow It Yourself"), how much she liked T.V., how the Sex Pistols were "a great bunch of guys" and how Toronto audiences are too quiet. The audiences she would most like to aim the Curse towards are high school and younger because "the kids can change" and they don't know about the Beatles and the Stones.

teenage head

One of the most popular punk-labelled bands in the city is the Hamilton (the Detroit of Canada) based Teenage Head. Since their debut at the Underground last year, they've managed to gain fans beyond the punk cult. The main reason for this is that these boys can actually play their instruments (no, really). The guitarist in particular, with his Johnny Thundersque (remember the New York Dolls?) riffs, makes the band a listenable quartet.

The band's biggest attraction is the cro-haired lead singer, Frankie Venom. His onstage oddities, which include climbing into the ceiling, swining from drain-pipes and flopping around like beached carp on his back, are much more entertaining than Natzee Dog's and more accessible to the average rock fan. He's as frantic as the old Iggy, but much less intimidating. He and the band's general appearance (e.g., long haired musicians) give them the option to move out of the punk vein when it fizzles out.

ugly

The Ugly are probably best known for attempting a surprise set at Teenage Outrage and getting beaten up for their efforts. In 5 months of rehearsing they have only played two gigs, at Schubert's and David's. The aim of their band is really to "go all the way", pushing themselves in performance to their limits.

Mike Nightmare the lead singer sees himself as a combination of the best of Bruce Lee and Antoin Artaud, a curious parentage. He particularly subscribes to the Baudelaire - Rimbaud theory of all-out living.

The Ugly do their own material onstage and like to see themselves as the pirates on the scene, eking out a living with their infrequent appearances. They feel it is just a matter of time before people recognize what they are trying to do and then, as Mike Nightmare put it, "They're really going to kill us." Tentative date at the Shock Theatre soon.

dishes

The Dishes are not a punk band. They are however New Wave. If any band can lay claim to being the paternal figures in the Toronto New Wave it is The Dishes. And long after the New Wave has been beached they will probably still be playing and being listened to. What else do you want to know? Their songs are humorous and satirical. They sound like... well they used to sound like a Looney Toones sound track played by Sparks but now they sound like the Dishes.

They've got a lead vocalist with a weird voice and funny hand movements, an alto sax player who appears on Coke ads, a keyboard player, guitar, bass and drums. They make great dance music and sound really psychotic. They've got an EP out on their very own label, Regular Records, called Fashion Plates. They also dress up funny.

So you want to know whose going to be the next rage? It's that wacki band from down the street and around the corner: the Concordes! If you think the New Wave is all wet you haven't seen this band. They make Talking Heads look dumb and Television sound like CFRBI! They premiered at Schubert's the end of August with Battered (and Fried) Wives and The (She's Got Tumors) Dents. They can out-trend the trendiest trends with little numbers like "It's Just a Fad" and "Art School".

Up front there's Sally Cato singing the raunchiest vocals since Iggy hit the stage in Motown and Eddy (Scuffle) La Guardia peeling paint with his red hot sax. There's master-of-the-bar-chord Johnny Citroen causing a fuss on his yellow Gibson and Eddy's brother Teddy (Knock em Down, Drag em Out) La Guardia Francious Overblown kicking out the jams on drums and bass. This band is a must!

steak on a bun

But what is that rough breathing and slouching presence just out of sight, over the horizon where the smoke is rising from green fields and the young suburbanites Sunday morning repose is ripped apart by the churning engines of Chevy II's.

Can it be that there is a crest rising behind the New Wave, that the Flood tide may be followed by the tidal bore?

Yes, the burghers are trembling as the roar grows louder. The announcer is stepping away from his microphone. The lights lower. In the darkness the faithful fidget, the bouncers grasp at the nearest blunt object and the Mississauga police begin to salivate.

From the wings come two hooded figures who hunch over squat objects. Through the P.A. comes a shriek which perforates the soundman's eardrums, "They're too long! Mow em down!" Two Toro engines explode; a saxophone, its reed bitten through, throws a 120 decibel E over high C knife into the crowd; the violin of John Cale's nightmares racks the senses; guitar and bass shunt chords the size of box cars into the air...

It's Steak on a Bun already banned by the municipal councils in Streetsville, Ospringe, and Meaford, wanted by the Portage la Prairie police on two charges of aggravated mopey, six of smashing camera equipment carried by otherwise law-abiding media mutants, and guitarist-B.E. man Bertie Wooster faces morals charges in Athabaska for unspeakable practices involving a female fan and a soprano saxophone.

These guys (and bassist Willamena Mudge) are for real. Nobody crowds their stage. Sax Player Farley Foghump carries more than one axe and swings them both. At their debut concert one unfortunate from the Mississauga Times who was lying on his back to get artsy camera angles was kneedopped twice and smashed repeatedly by the business end of a Fender bass (charges pending).

Yeah, it's a great show if you're in the balcony. For their encore they start industrial gauge B&D chainsaws and hurl them into the crowd while shouting, "Free Wayne Kramer!"

Good times!

I'd like a record contract I'd like it for a lot of money. I'm positive it will come. Natzee Dog

Outrageous

The difference between a movie made in Toronto and a Toronto-made movie is decided by whether or not there is at least one shot of the CN Tower. Toronto is in the process of becoming a feature film production centre. With its combination of handsome tax write-offs, loose to non-existent (maybe I should say flexible) unions, starving and only-too-eager-to-work graduate film students and a wide selection of this-could-be-anywhere architecture, Toronto may well be to the American film industry what Tijuana was to the American legal system. This of course is all quite fine except for the fact that Toronto is in danger of yet again developing a personality or at least a physical appearance with enough distinctiveness to render it useless as a stand-in for a medium-sized American city. How many great shots, planned by Hollywood trained cinematographers have been spoiled by the CN Tower?

One of the joys of Outrageous — at least for a Toronto audience — is the film's very definite sense of place. For a non-Torontonian audience the film's very homey aura probably gives it a greater credibility. For anybody at all familiar with "Tranna", a shot of a

Mr. Submarine store is almost a visual gag in itself. Outrageous is the kind of film that Hollywood just can't make and not just because of location.

The film's director, Richard Benner, based his script on the story "Making It" from The Butterfly Ward. In his version, a young schizophrenic girl Lisa escapes from a mental hospital and takes up residence with an old friend Robin Turner. Robin, in his own words, is a "screaming hairdresser" but beneath his cynical remarks he harbors the dream of becoming a famous female impersonator. With Lisa's encouragement Robin finally develops the strength necessary to stop performing his Judy Garland's and Bette Davis' in front of the bathroom mirror and start entertaining live audiences. Between her struggle to maintain control over her fantasy world, his growing confidence in his talents, and their mutual support of themselves and their friends against the forces of mediocrity, (in this case psychiatrists and beauty salon owners), there hangs a tale. One which American producers would buy from Benner. It would be in-drag queens, schizos, and the myth of Toronto

teresting to know just what the gringos had in mind, Tony Randal as Robin Turner, Jack Nicholson in drag as Lisa, who knows? Who cares?

Benner did the film himself with the financial aid of Bill Marshall and Hank Vander Kolk and the result is a good film (not great, anyone can make a great film with enough money), very witty and humane.

The acting is excellent. True, having an accomplished female impersonator like Craig Russell play a female impersonator is pretty easy but those scenes which require Russell to be "just" Robin Turner are equally well handled. The role of Lisa is a very difficult one. All too often schizophrenic characters are used as an excuse for the director to drag in some weird photography and disorienting editing. There is no need for this with Hollis Maclaren's performance. Lisa's madness is of an almost Blakean, visionary sort but they are more than visions. They are presences with whom she physically fights or converses. And, thanks to Maclaren's acting and Benner's tact in allowing his actors to do the work Lisa's world is quite believable.

So is Robin's. Few films have ever been as casual in their depiction of the homosexual community. Most features that "deal" in this area try too hard to be 'about Homosexuals' even when the director himself is gay. A film like Fassbinder's Fox and his Friends, despite his honesty, by comparison to Outrageous looks more like a confession of guilt than a statement about being what one is.

Benner is wise to this very complex segment of society and has chosen as his focus the drag queen, the transvestite. In certain circles of gay society the transvestite is looked down upon, his sexual ambivalence upsets macho gays as much as macho straights. Those drags who emulate the glamour of Hollywood stars are not the sort of fellows most likely to be part of the plans of those gays involved in revolutionary dreams of the overthrow of sexual repression. By both gays and straights the drag queen is viewed as a pathetic figure but neither side is immune to admiring the skill with which some drags pursue their craft.

The relationship between Lisa and Robin is platonic. Their understanding of one another's imaginations and the perils of reality forge between them something that can only be called love. Most folks prefer love stories to be romantic, glamorous, and idealized when not erotic. If those fantasies don't appeal to you then Outrageous, with its very simple charm, might.

Overall the film winds its way through scenes of light comedy and high drama, hindered at points by some jumps in continuity. It seems as if certain scenes have been deleted for the sake of pacing but what is left holds together quite well. If you haven't seen Star Wars yet hold it off for another week and see Outrageous instead.

Toronto may become a high class production centre but taste being what it is films like Outrageous still have (like drag queens) to go to New York to be appreciated.

Bach: Christmas Oratorio. Elly Ameling (sop.), Janet Baker (alt.), Robert Tear (ten.), Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau (bass), King's College Choir, Academy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Philip Ledger (Angel SC-3840).

Is it merely a coincidence when Angel records releases a new version of Bach's Christmas Oratorio in the autumn, or could the company that commercialized seraphim be aware of the fall-Christmas record-buying season? That would be secular indeed of Angel.

But this recording will have an audience far beyond those who only see Bach cantatas in their religious context.

Unlike the Biblical extravaganzas done in Hollywood, where stars are squeezed in, destroying the effect, the stellar cast of this recording doesn't upstage the true star, who gets first billing: J. S. Bach, in other words.

The King's College sound is quite unique. Above and beyond their purity of tone, they must be one of the few choirs in the world that can sing German with an English accent. That's hardly a problem, considering their musical abilities.

The soloists make different responses to the technical demands. Tear and Fischer-Dieskau take coherent, yet essentially opposed approaches. Tear's lyrical Bach is tensely controlled, but well-produced; his staccato in the aria "Ich will nur dir zu Ehren leben" is lovely, highly musical, losing none of its tone, but possessing little textual meaning. Fischer-Dieskau, on the other hand, never loses sight of the interpretation of the text. His lyrical voice is often, as is his wont, produced in his head, but loose and phrased with a natural ease. His staccati in an aria comparable to Tear's ("Grosser Herr und starker Koenig") is human, bluff, and a little uncontrolled in musical terms, but absolutely right for the text.

There is not so sharp a distinction to be made between the interpretations of the women. Elly Ameling's singing sounds slightly freer than Janet Baker's, indeed, a bit loose in places, but to the same sort of effect as was mentioned for Fischer-Dieskau above. Ameling possesses fewer natural vocal resources than Baker, so she is more limited in the intensities that she may use. Baker's voice suggests the whole question of the selection of intensity; even when singing softly she cannot conceal her power. Her Bach is carefully placed in an intensity range that does not make Ameling sound mousy, and the Bach sound like Wagner (which she could do).

Conductor Ledger brings out the festive and celebratory quality of the music: the rhythms are accented, and the tone often lapses, deliberately I feel, into roughness for the appropriate sense of enthusiasm. The balances are effective, but the real hero in that respect is the recording-engineer.

This review only points to the flaws, really; I fail to cite the sheer brilliance of this recording. And it would make a good Christmas present.

Leslie Barcza

Dvorak: Piano Concerto in G minor, Op. 33. Sviatoslav Richter (piano), Bavarian State Orch., Carlos Kleiber (Angel S 37239).

This early concerto has played the part of a neglected masterpiece for several years, and found all the praise it is likely to get. Its half-hour first movement offers some striking tunes and powerful moments, but as a sample of form and coherence is a bust. The rhythmically static Andante sounds deathly at any speed, and the Finale outlives its melodic materials with embarrassing results.

Nevertheless, Sviatoslav Richter's power and lyricism make good listening of side one at least. The grace and precision with which he handles Dvorak's piano writing almost incline one to forget how unpleasant it really is. If nothing else, the Finale is a demonstration of how rhythmically exciting Richter can be.

As a whole, however, the recording lacks immediacy and life. Kleiber's sluggish way with the Bavarian State Orchestra is mostly to blame. Although Kleiber does remarkable things with balance and inner voices, his approach to pace and phrasing is far too soft and foggy. It is strange that such a fine Beethoven conductor should file such a listless and unidiomatic performance of a work obviously modelled after that master. The sound quality of the disc is generally satisfactory, but the orchestra sounds disturbingly distant.

A tale of two Rudolphs

Ken Russell's much ballyhooed movie Valentino has finally arrived in Toronto. Unfortunately though, for the public, it's not worth the price of admission.

Russell tries to portray Valentino as a victim of the Hollywood establishment — "... a man who wants only to be a farmer turned into a God. . . ." Instead, Valentino appears as a weak individual who is bullied by his wife Natasha (Michelle Phillips) and is constantly trying to defend his manhood.

The one memorable scene from the film has to be when Valentino is locked in the jail with a group of perverts who are determined to prove Valentino's manhood. Valentino's pain, shame and distaste comes across quite clearly.

Despite the few good scenes, Russell's attempt at providing the audience with a rounded view of Valentino's life does not work. The film is a group of scenes put together, nothing more.

Rudolph Nureyev, as Valentino lacks the ability to take over the Valentino personality while leaving his own behind. Throughout the picture, one is always aware of seeing the dancer, Nureyev, on the screen rather than the lover, Valentino.

During the dance sequences, Nureyev is at his best. His carriage and his dancing prowess are quite evident in the various tango scenes. Although Nureyev cannot be faulted for the picture's dismal failure, Russell might have been better off by casting a relative unknown.

Michelle Phillips, who plays Valentino's second wife, the domineering Natasha, gives a plausible performance, but not enough to help the film.

Leslie Caron, who plays the very eccentric Nazimova, gives a good performance, portraying the flamboyancy of Nazimova in manner suited to Russell's purposes.

To put together a film about the life of Rudolph Valentino would be difficult for any director, because of the great aura and mystique that surrounds him. Russell's attempt may be classified simply: Failure.

Geeks peek at mop top freak

Rod Stewart is no longer the "rocker", distinguished for his raspy-voiced vocals. He has added a new dimension to his act, an addition that has left loyal fans in a somewhat doubtful state.

He moved onto a white-shrouded centre-stage at the Gardens Tuesday evening with a full-blown, well-rehearsed set of antics that did their best to distract the audience from the inconsistencies of the music itself. In his renditions of "The Killing of George" and "Tonight's the Night", it became sadly evident that the sophisticated choreography and inhibition of a stage-show has replaced the impromptu dynamism of Stewart rock and roll. Mind you, it was not a boring show — it just wasn't that exciting.

At one point he gravelled into the mike "Let's get into the rough stuff". Fat chance. His burlesque act and costuming, teased the audience, just as the opening bars of many songs stimulated an interest that was soon to wane as the numbers progressed. Even Stewart's gigantic Tarzan leaps off the piano, in an off-the-shoulder black jumpsuit could not hide the lethargy of the instrumentation.

His new conglomeration of back-up talent has potential, with a triple guitar front line-up and a drummer whose amazing talent was well-evidenced in a percussion solo that went well beyond what is usually an annoying segment of virtuoso demonstrations. The drum soliloquy came at mid-session, and injected a shot of energy into a rather average rendition of "I'm Losing You". Nostalgia for the old days of Ron Wood and Faces hit like a ton of brick.

Stewart's performance was not totally without inspiration. A reggae version of "Maggie May" was an interesting expansion of an old reliable hit. But again, not a moment later, disappointment became the rule rather than the exception. He moved into the next number of incorporating a dull disco beat in what could have, and should have been Stewart rock and roll.

Yet the professionalism of his crew was ever evident. The lighting and staging was superbly synchronized — a facet that made Stewart's debut as a budding artist of dramatic movement a bit easier to take.

Rod Stewart has moved on. But he may have left a lot of us behind.

Randy Newman as Old Black Joe

For those who have waited to see Randy Newman, the concert last Sunday night at Massey Hall was excellent and without disappointment. Those who merely came, having invested only money and a little time, were certainly entertained, if not swept away.

Randy Newman came on stage quiet and unannounced, relying on a friendly audience to recognize and welcome him. Newman was unaccompanied on his piano — part of the charm of the evening. Newman sang his own songs, alone, quietly and intimately, giving the gift of his presence to the already strong lyrics and music. His music plays on ragtime, adding a deep Southern version of slinky sexy bump, and together the two make you tap your toes and move your thighs.

His lyrics seem without precedent: he sings a white-man's blues without the squeaky-clean pathos of Paul Simon, or the violent sympathy of Dylan. His humour is of the Bonnie-and-Clyde school, where the images race so quickly from comedy to tragedy that the mind fails to shift properly, and is left a little behind. Most of the audience were it seemed, hard-core Newman freaks; a few people were there because Newman is a "name" and these people left with some confusion on their face. Yet even the fans who recognized a song not even a measure into the melody retreated occasionally into that too loud, too strong, laughter, provoked by Newman's stark lyrics, as in "A Wedding in Cherokee County," embarrassing in their realism.

Much of the music was about the American South, taken from the album Good Ole Boys. No one since James Agee has managed to move so successfully as a spy among that foreign country within a country, that south made up of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Tennessee, Louisiana, and Texas. A culture so far away from our own has slipped into a mythology without us knowing it. Newman embraces the myths, then forces them to show their truth, as in the song "Red Necks." Part of the openness of the concert came out of the richness of the South, given shy testimony by Newman singing in the mellow vowels of English well-spoken, English spoken and sung Southern style, slow and sexy.

Alone on the stage with his piano Newman persisted in being free of hype. Only a handful of the songs he did were from his new album, and none of them was the title cut, Little Criminals. Most of the new songs were recognized with the same speed and enthusiasm as the old and favourite: "Louisiana," "Guilty,"

"Sail Away," and "Birmingham." Most of these songs are from the albums Sail Away and Good Ole Boys, with a few more from earlier albums. A new song, "Jolly Coppers on Parade," is awesome. Most impressive and refreshing was the enthusiasm with which every song was done. So everyone had a fine evening, including Randy, and he came back for two long encores. As usual with Newman, you come away at least impressed.

Wiffen wheezes romance

"What can I say," are the words David Wiffen a folk singer from the Ottawa Valley repeated between songs at the Innis Town Hall on Thursday. These words did not communicate the seriousness of their intent to the audience of 150. Wiffen said at one point in the concert, "nothing I've said so far has been appreciated because what I wanted to convey wasn't put the way I wanted." After listening to his music and later speaking with him, I realized the struggle this artist had with words and the way they related to his feeling.

Wiffen, a friend and colleague of Cockburn and McLauchlan, said that writing was a "hang-up not a job." He said that "inspiration" is what makes writing music a struggle as opposed to work. A crude mixture of romanticism and symbolism is apparent in songs like "Fire and Water" and "Cocaine". The romantic use of landscape imagery in the lyrics brought out the picturesque grotesqueness of the ever prevailing atmosphere of love and squalor in Wiffen's music. In "Fire and Water", we are in a dingy hotel in Kingston looking outside the window at the crime in the streets, while in "Cocaine" we are experiencing the exquisite feeling, suggested by the singers jovial voice, of the drug moving all around our brain.

Wiffen weaves back and forth from these romantic landscapes to symbols that are unrelated to the immediate narrative. His music almost wishes to go toward a ballad form but because of its inconsistency in narrative and delivery it never reaches that stage. Distracting phrases as 'put the bottle down', 'we may be free', and 'maybe my dreams may come true some day' are by nature symbolist because they divert from the logical depiction of the landscape in a progressive narrative. His way of raising his voice to convey climactic points in the narrative only distracts the listener from the landscape and atmosphere of the music while heightening an awareness of the frustration of the artist. This struggle between artist and man, romanticist and symbolist, and finally between mystic and wanderer, compound together to make his music very confusing. There seems to be no singleness in purpose to his definition of art nor does his music attempt to become structured.

Wiffen retired from the music business for a time to re-evaluate himself and has just started a comeback recently. He puts together a very enjoyable show but I feel he must still re-evaluate himself as artist and his type of music. There is too much Wiffen in the music that is pure feeling and not enough discipline.

As a special offer to U of T students, The Canadian Opera Company is offering a discount on tickets for their production of Alban Berg's Wozzeck. A section of $15 and $10 seats has been set aside for sale at $4, at the SAC office, and EJB box office.

The Massey Hall Beethoven Festival winds up tonight and tomorrow with Andrew Davis conducting the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies. Rush seats available at 7:00; concert starts at 8:30.

The current Brahms chamber cycle at Town Hall features the Beaux Arts Trio, clarinetist Richard Stoltzman, and pianist Menahem Pressler tonight at 8:00. Program includes an unrecorded piano trio; tickets $5.50 and $6.50. Saturday night at Town Hall the Norwegian Wind Quintet and the York Winds offer an avant-garde program. Starts 8:30, student tickets $3.

Sunday concerts at the EJB include the Orford Quartet (all-Beethoven) at 3:00 and the U of T Symphony (Brahms-Freeman-Tchaikovsky) at 8:30. Student tickets $4 for Orford, $1.50 for the Symphony. The Hart House Sunday Evening Concert features the Purcell Quartet, Simon Fraser's resident unit, in a Haydn-Dvorak Program. The Brahms cycle continues Monday at 8:00 with Quartet Canada and pianist Ronald Turin. The Piano Quartets and the D minor Violin Sonata are programmed. Tuesday and Wednesday at Massey Hall, Andrew Davis opens Series A weirdly enough with Messiaen's Turangallia Symphony. Thursday at 2:10, German pianist Detlef Kraus gives a lecture-recital at Walter Hall (EJB) on - you guessed it - Brahms' piano music. More Brahms madness at Town Hall Thursday evening with the Orford Quartet.

Hello Jazz Fans! Try to catch the Ray Bryant Trio (piano) before Saturday at D.J.'s Tavern. Like so many other fine jazz musicians, Bryant was forced to go commercial during the sixties, wasting his talent on pop-jazz. Now that the sexy seventies have revitalized jazz audiences, he has re-entered the fold. His music makes for easy listening, and is possibly danceable. On Monday, Peewee Irwin (trumpet) takes over. Irwin's credentials run back to Louis Armstrong, Earl Hines, Woody Herman and Glen Miller.

I always give Eugene Amaro a big plug in this column; in my opinion he's the finest sax player in the city. But I also feel that he can also be enjoyed by those with at most a dubious feeling for jazz. His swing is infectious, and he generates an intense energy. At Yellowfingers until Saturday. After hours at the same club, the Mike Ricci Quartet (tenor) tonight and tomorrow. Dave tells me that Ricci swings too. Next week, the club features Don Franks, a poet-philosopher-singer from Finian's Rainbow. Sounds pretty crummy.

At Blondies, the Andy Krehm

Quartet (guitar) finishes off the week, marking the end of the club's short-lived jazz policy. Catch the last act! The obituary will follow in next week's column.

Gap Mangione performs at Bourbon St. until Saturday, followed on Monday by Frank Rosolino (trombone). I should emphasize again that you shouldn't sit in the bar area if you expect to hear music at this club — the acoustics are terrible. Sorry Ann & Raj.

Shepherd Moe Koffman swings his 24K gold flute at George's tonight and tomorrow, followed by his friend Guido Basso on trumpet next week.

Frank Houchen's Cafe Soho features rising Toronto talent as usual after hours on Friday and Saturday at 334 Queen W. Tonight, the Tim Cummins Quartet (guitar), and tomorrow the Lorne Lofsky Trio (more guitar). Call Frank himself for more information at 862-0199. He informs me that the club may even erect its own sign in the near future.

Free Concert: The Joe Sarjeant Trio at Hart House Wednesday at noon.

Editorial Note: Thanks for the correction, Jim.

The Art Gallery of Ontario's Looking at Dance - Live, on Film, as Video begins next Wed. and will offer 3 different programs each Wed. and Thurs. for the next 6 weeks.

Oct. 19: 5:30 p.m. — The Pas de Deux is celebrated in 5 films, one of which is "Le Jeune Homme et la mort", choreographed and directed by Roland Petit, featuring Rudolf Nureyev and Petit's former wife Zizi Jeanmaire. 7 p.m. - Norman Campbell's Romeo and Juliet originally produced for the CBC with Veronica Tennant, Earl Kraul and Celia Franca. 9:15 p.m. Children of Theatre Street (1977). It's a 90-min. colour film which cost U.S. choreographer Earle Mack $500,000 to make. Featuring the students and faculty of the Vaganova Choreography Institute and narrated by Princess Grace of Monaco, it tells the story of 3 children in contemporary Leningrad who are graduating from ballet school.

Oct. 20: 5:30 p.m. — "Production Numbers" is a look at large scale dancing in U.S. films. 7 p.m. - "Jazz Dance", a collage of 11 Big Band Era films from a private collection. 8:30 p.m. - "Popular Dancing on Film" combines excerpts of dance in film with the likes of Fred Astaire and others plus a lecture by David Parker of the Motion Picture Section, Library of Congress.

At the Lecture Hall of the Art Gallery. Last program each eve. has $2 admission charge; others free with Gallery admission. All events require tickets. 317 Dundas St. W. Info: 361-0414.

Ballet Y's plays host to Tourneval, the nation's smallest dance troupe next Fri. thru Sun. as Winnipeg's Carole and Ernst Eder perform John Julian's Separation. $3, 8:30 p.m. 366 Adelaide St. E. Info: 366-3428.

The St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall becomes an Indian temple on Sat., Oct. 22 as Menaka Thakkar and five well-known Indian musicians present an evening of authentic Indian music and dance. Thakkar will perform her specialties: the Odissi and Bharatnatyam styles of Indian dance. At 8:30 p.m. Student tickets $4 and $5. Box Office: 366-7723.

Those lovely gentlemen of the dance from the Big Apple, Les Ballets Trocardero de Monte Carlo, descend upon Toronto Oct. 25 and 26 at the Queen Elizabeth Theatre, CNE. Will the stately Queen Elizabeth Theatre survive two evenings of relentless "male" bitchiness in the classical tradition of the very finest prima ballerinas? I couldn't say. The Trocarderos' 10 "tutued" males climb onto pointe to deliver such intriguingly titled works as "Evening in Paris" (which brings to mind that cheap perfume of the dark, blue bottle), "Yes, Virginia, Another Piano Ballet" and "The Dance of Liberation of the American People". Tickets $9.50, $8, $6, $6.50. For info: 366-7551.

rock

Contrary to popular belief, the big news of the week is not that Chicago are playing the Gardens on the 31st. Chicago is always playing the Gardens. The big news is that Be Bop Deluxe will be making their first major Toronto appearance at Seneca on the 22nd. They're an intelligent and extremely adept band so try to catch them.

Elsewhere the concert scene is buzzing with up and coming talent, including the stunning virtuosity and musical adroitness of the avant-garde Thin Lizzy. They'll be at Seneca on the 28th (Graham Parker and the Rumour open the show. If you're into progressive jazz and sensitive, meaningful lyrics, don't see Trooper at Massey Hall on the 17th.

In the softer vein, Stevie Goodman will be at Con Hall this Sunday. The legendary Brotherhood of Man will be at the O'Keefe on the 30th. That should be a hoot.

Rumour has it that Kiss will not be playing Toronto in the near future and Cheap Trick will not be opening for them.

Tonight at clubs we have Downchild at the Chimney, Hot Rox at the Gasworks, the eclectic Dave Wilcox at the El Mocambo and the soon-to-be-a-legend-in-their-own-time Zon at Larry's. For people who like to be able to hear themselves think, Ray Materick is at the Riverboat tonight and Eric Nagler is at the Nervous Breakdown Cafe.

Closer to home, SAC is presenting Bond at Dr. John's tonight (U.C. Refectory) tonight. Even closer to home, you can catch Flo and Eddy on Ninety Minutes Live tonight at around midnight.

movies

It's late. The rain is tapping on the windows. No editorial comment today.

Friday: Out for a good time boys and girls? Well, maybe the movies aren't a good idea but if you haven't seen Annie Hall and paid the big prices you can go to the New Yorker tonight or tomorrow night and pay the little big prices to see it with Where's Poppa (bring a blindfold and a pillow) and Jabberwocky at midnight. The Roxy has Beatles movies. Lumiere has yet another Orson Welles fiasco For Fake, pairs with Bunuel's Tristana. The Review offers Jules and Jim and Lumiere.

Saturday: No changes and the U of T Film Society is still showing Young Frankenstein and Silent Movie (enough, enough).

Sunday: Innis again shows its amazing collection of cartoons at 2:00 this week featuring the work of Tex Avery (the man who brought you B.B. and D.D.). At 5:00 they have silents on ornithological themes Voices of the Nightingale and The Eagle. At 8:00, Women in the Movies continues with Wuthering Heights (and it sure as hell is better than Villette all you English majors). But on the agony of Sundays, the ACO is being as tempting as usual with The Four Hundred Blows and Le Signe de Lion. Lumiere has period tedium with The Reckoning and The Go-Between. The Revue has dug deeper into its library of French marvels and exhumes two which don't see the Toronto sun as often as most subway works Salut l'artiste and A Drama of Jealousy and Other Things. And as if that weren't enough to engender arguments among the most cooing of housemates the New Yorker panders to the lobots with Murder by Death, The Front, and Dr. Strangelove. (By the way let it be known that Kim is not mentioning the weeklong engagement of Swept Away and Seven Beauties at The Screening Room — ed.)

Monday: Cinema Lumiere has two I won't see Nana and Cluny Brown. The New Yorker has two more Islands in the Stream and Little Big Man. The Roxy, for a change, makes that long haul out to the east end worth the subway fare with The Late Show and (well er um) Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore.

Tuesday: Innis has Zorba the Chicken Eater. The New Yorker offers to wonders of the political spectrum with California Reich (guaranteed to warm the hearts of all those campus clubs who write letters to the editor) and Idi Amin: A Self-Portrait. The Roxy Repeats and the Revue trots out more of its Truffaut collection (for all of you who wonder what second-hand hitchcock looks like) Mississippi Mermald and Shoot the Piano Player (which is lovingly dedicated to Keith Emerson).

Wednesday and Thursday: Well you see it's like this. I was about to finish the column when this Globe and Mail staffer jumped in my window and ran off with all my information. He was screaming competitive slogans and...

Well maybe next week, by which time they might have Freed Wayne Kramer.

theatre

The early bird gets the column inches. Another brief look at the theatre scene; October 14-20: Opening soon: at the St. Lawrence, Dekker's Shoemaker's Holiday, previewing Monday and Tuesday at 7:30, first night the same time, all future shows except for the Saturday matinee (at 2 p.m.) at 8:00; rush tickets are generally available, bring a student card. At Toronto Workshop, 12 Alexander Street, Rick Salutin's Les Canadiens (with an assist by Ken Dryden) previews Tuesday & continues with performances at 8:30. Call 925-8640. The same night, Strindberg's Dream Play opens the Tarragon's new season at 30 Bridgman, call 531-1827 for details. Truthfully, there's a preview Monday night and the Sunday shows are PWYC matinees.

On the boards now, Ayckbourn's Absurd Person Singular at the AUAC's Firehall Theatre, 70 Berkeley St. (364-4170) and his success Relatively Speaking at Toronto Truck Theatre's Colonnade location (922-0084). Paper Wheat has crept into town from the west and Yr. obvt. missed it last week. At Cafe Soho, 334 Queen Street W. Saturday and Sunday only. Around campus, Erindale College Studio Theatre, 3359 Mississauga Rd., presents a noon-hour coffee and mime theatre next Thursday. Call 828-5349 for information, and tourist bureau for you St. George campus types. At the New Vic theatre, beginning I believe the same day, Joe Orton's grotesque and delightful Loat. Coming soon, Robertson Davies Pontiac and the Green Man at the Macmillan Theatre. Last day for Intersection at The Unlimited Space, mime emporium extraordinary, call 461-6551. At Bathurst St., Wozzeck continues call 535-9996, and in the New Theatre space, Jack of Diamonds hucksters its way into your childbained hearts. Call 364-5202. Desperado, though not well-liked by the critics, is not about to go away, and if you want to find out what Carol Bolt's up to after One Night Stand, call the Toronto Free Theatre at 368-2856.

Or if you are really interested in Carol Bolt or any other of the writers-in-residence who have worked out of the U of T, you might consider queuing for the few rush seats still available for the Hart House-SAC-sponsored Writers-in-Residence programme, which includes readings and discussions of the programme's usefulness to the writers themselves and the university writers they encounter.

This has been a paid political announcement.

Autograph hounds should stop at David Mirvish Books on Art (Markham St.) on Sunday at 3 pm for signatory flourishes from Harold Town and David Silcox. They'll be signing their new cloth-bound book Tom Thomson: The Silence and The Storm. Running concurrently at the neighbouring gallery — an exhibition of Thomas's paintings till Nov. 13.

Joe Rosenblatt will also be hosting viewers from 2-6 pm at the Gadatsky Gallery on Yorkville. The show, entitled Snake Oil, presents a selection of fantasy snake drawings (do you fantasize about snakes).

For two bucks at A Space at 8:30 pm the Toronto underground can be seen... it's alive... presenting The Bible, as told to Karen Ann Quilman. The Hummer Talent Cartel, a collection of artists, writers, videographers, and actors, will be held responsible.

Our friend Don Jean-Louis, who sidelines as manager of the Vile Tones is showing a Ten Year Survey of his electric experimental art at The Electric Gallery. He's presently working on wall murals for the Eaton Centre. Till Nov. 3.

Blurs by Eldon Gamet at the Isaacs Gallery. The Isaacs has always championed Toronto's avant-garde artists and once again proves brave. Actually an interesting series of large canvases — black on white. Till Oct. 28.

Opening Saturday at Gallery Moos, colourful line abstracts by Rita Letendre. The Moos has proven consistently superb and there's no need to doubt the quality of the Letendre exhibition.

For those of you who read my Ken Danby article and want to taste realism for yourself, Charles Comfort opens with recent paintings on Wednesday at the Roberts Gallery. For the diametric opposite, visit the Albert White Gallery for the paintings and graphics of the French modernist Dubuffet.

The AGO is a free-standing structure, (in answer to a letter to me on the matter) and has a variety of holdovers — the mixed media of Bonita Collins, Victor Thind, and Charles Pachter; The Dutch Cityscape of the 17th century; and of course the new wing.

Acrobatic sculpture at the Prince Arthur Galleries by New Yorker Chaim Gross. Check the Review for a detailed critique. Till Oct. 28.

Patrick Landley is showing for the first time at the Merton Gallery. A Montreal artist, his prints and drawings include "The Laurentians, Painters in a Landscape". Till Oct. 29.

In anticipation of next year's 10th International Sculpture Conference, the Harbourfront Art Gallery has an exhibition of sculpture images and ideas. Representative works from a number of Toronto artists.

Jane Martin's New Paintings I insist are ingenious in their sense of pattern. Catch the show before it closes on Thursday, at the Aggregation Gallery.

Stan Hughes' watercolours continue on view at the Hart House Art Gallery until Friday. If you're not sure where it is, try the basement, next to the lockers.

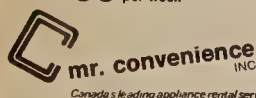

Gisèle Freund, a pioneer in colour photography, has proven since the thirties, the value and stability of Kodak colour prints. Included is a 1939 photo of Virginia Woolf. At The David Mirvish Gallery till Oct. 19.

Finally, the ROM has a shatteringly complete special exhibition entitled A Gusher of Glass. The display of decorative glass throughout the ages is second only to the glass entertainment at the preview where four musicians played background music by ringing crystal and playing glass xylophones and bells.

Blues Looking For Homecoming Victory

By JIM O'LEARY

As hard as it may be to imagine, this Saturday's homecoming game against York is an important one for the Blues. York has never beaten the Blues but nevertheless the Blues will enter the game with a certain amount of apprehension.

This apprehension stems not so much from a fear of York as it does from pressure the Blues have placed on themselves by their poor showing against Guelph last week. It took a last minute drive to salvage a victory against the supposedly hapless Gryphons.

With their victory, the Blues have finally been rated the nation's number one college team. This ranking puts them under pressure to come up with a better performance against York than the one in Guelph. A solid Blues' performance in Guelph last week would have alleviated much of this pressure.

The near loss to Guelph was a shock to the Toronto team. In their dressing room after the game it was noticeable that their confidence had been rocked. The sounds of victory were replaced by an eerie silence as the players tried to figure out why they had played so badly.

Some players tried to convince others that they had won and that was all that mattered, but they weren't very convincing. Everyone knew that Toronto did not really deserve to win that game.

With this victory, Toronto assumed the number one ranking.

The disturbing thing is that just about every player in the Toronto dressing room realized that they did not deserve to win.

The York game is therefore a very important one for the Toronto players. They not only need to win but they have to win big to restore their own confidence and to convince those who doubt that Toronto deserves the number one ranking.

A big Toronto victory is also essential to give the Blues the confidence and momentum they will need to tackle Western next week.

York has never been an easy team for the Blues to beat despite the fact that they have never fielded a strong team. The natural rivalry which exists between the two Toronto universities seems to push York to their ultimate which often makes these games more interesting than one would expect.

Saturday's game should be no exception as York tries to play the role of the spoiler.

Blues hope to gain momentum for game against Western.

Fight the Flab....

By HUGH STUART

Writing about the football and rugby Blues has let me witness the thrill of victory. After being told the results of my fitness test last Wednesday, I had a taste of the agony of defeat... but it was worth it.

The U of T fitness centre is located in Room 104 of Hart House and although the traffic flowing in and out of that room resembles the traffic at the local Brewers Retail, you get forty minutes of personal attention.

The first thing that they do is make you sign a statement releasing the university from any liability in case you keel over during the test. If, after reading that, you decide to plunge on, your height and weight are measured. But that is where any resemblance to the check up you get at your family doctor's ends.

By taking a hand grip test, your body strength is measured. I was surprised to learn from the information booklet that, "It is the best single index of total body strength." Next in line is a test that measures the percentage of fat on your body. To do this, the tester uses a device resembling a lobster claw and pinches various parts of your body (depending upon what sex you are!). None of this is too taxing, and just when you think you are going to escape without losing a drop of sweat, you're told to hop on one of their two stationary bicycles.

Remember the slow, peaceful bicycle rides that you took this summer? Well this final test might turn you off of cycling forever. After being hooked up to a cardiogram, you partake in an unscenic twelve minute ride. Still doesn't sound too bad, you say? Well, have I got news for you. The bicycle is adjusted so that your twelve minute journey to nowhere gets progressively harder. For finishing the ride, the only reward awaiting me was my results.

Using well-practiced bicycle side manner, Carol Brady broke it to me slowly, "You and my eighty-five-year-old grandmother could have a good armwrestle." Ego deflated, I suffered throughout the rest of her appraisal.

Seriously, if you are concerned about your fitness, I recommend that you make an appointment soon (it's free). If you are not fit, they'll tell you and help you get set up with a program. On the other hand, if you and Bruce Jenner share the same test results, a visit will do wonders for your ego.

Riding a bicycle is only one exercise in fitness test at Hart House.

Lady Blues Open Season

By SANDY TURNER

After four weeks of tough practice the U of T women's basketball team opened their exhibition season Wednesday. Early, hard work paid off as the Blues totally dominated George Brown College. The final score reflected the play as the Blues came out on top 71-29.

The game allowed for the refinement of the Blues offensive and defensive strategies. Improved shooting and scoring auger well for the rest of the season. Wednesday's game featured a 39 percent scoring average with Barb Grochowski scoring 18 points and Sharon Kosmachuk 15. Both man-to-man and zone defenses worked effectively for the Blues.

Soccer Blues Tie Waterloo

By GREG REEDS

The Varsity Blues Soccer team came up against the tough Waterloo Warriors on Wednesday afternoon and battled the visitors to a 3-3 tie. The one point gained by the Blues' fails to give an accurate picture of the fine effort put forth by the Blues.

The game was billed as a rematch of last year's Ontario final in which the Blues secured the championship on a goal in the last minute.

The Blues played without several key players who were forced to the sidelines by injuries. Coach Nicol's team however, exhibited the depth which is necessary in the late season drive to the playoffs.

The Warriors built a two goal lead before Yannis Vassiliou put Toronto on the scoreboard. The goal came just before the end of the half which served to buoy the Blues' spirits going into the dressing room for the break.

The Warriors started quickly in the second half and took a 3-1 lead. It is to the credit of the Blues that they never gave up and battled hard to overcome the deficit.

From the time of Waterloo's third goal to the sound of the final whistle the Blues controlled the game. Their aggressive play resulted in a beautiful goal by E. Bevilacqua. Bevilacqua handcuffed the Waterloo goalie with a hard curve shot.

The Blues' comeback was completed by Yannis Vassiliou who picked the corner with a hard shot.

The Blues sustained pressure throughout the remainder of the game but were unable to put away the winner.

The tie keeps Varsity's playoff hopes alive. Tomorrow's game against the York Yeomen at Scarborough College could set the stage for a playoff showdown.

Intermediates Defeat Trent

By SHAUNE PALMER

Unaccustomed as they may have been to playing in decent weather conditions, the Intermediate Field hockey team came up with an impressive victory against Trent University last night.

The team has been displaying the form that won them the championship last year and last night's game may be an indication of a repeat performance. Goals were put in by Karen McKleister and Crol Gombita and with one goal against, the final score was 3-1. Danny Catello, a player in her first year, gave an impressive performance.

New tactics are still to be introduced and technique can always be improved, but the team looks as though it will be ready for Part I of the major University competition coming up in one week's time.

Both Senior and Intermediate teams will journey to Scarborough College this Saturday to take on McMaster and Waterloo in exhibition games. Waterloo has always been a contender and though not an overpowering team, McMaster cannot be underestimated.

Hockey Blues Drop Opener

By JIM O'LEARY

The Varsity Blues hockey team opened their exhibition season with a 6-5 loss to the Whitby Warriors of the Ontario Senior A League on Wednesday night. Before a meagre crowd of less than 75, the Blues fell behind early and despite a late rally could not catch up.

Coach Tom Watt was not overly concerned with the loss. The game gave Watt his first chance to see many of the players in a game situation. As he explained, "Our training sessions have been concerned with player selection rather than team play." For this reason Watt was not too surprised by the erratic play of the defence in their own end.

This game also marked the first time many of the players played together which made it difficult to compete with the Whitby team which had been together longer.

Watt was unhappy with the many defensive mistakes made by Toronto. The Blues' defensive lapses resulted in their falling behind 4-1 in the first period. Under pressure the Blues coughed up the puck and left Whitby players standing around in front of the net.

The defensive lapses can in part be accounted for by the fact that of the defencemen dressed last night, only Rocci Pagnello was a starter last year. The Blues' are counting heavily on players like Lance Gattoni and Wayne Morrissey to come up with big seasons to anchor the defence.

As the game progressed, the defence and goaltending settled down while the offence started to click. The first Toronto goal was scored by Rob Gemmell on a power play.

Other scorers for Toronto were Jim Snetsinger, Dan D'Alvise, Doug Herdridge, and Larry Hopkins. Bob Adoranti, Lance Gattoni and Cary Ferelli each picked up two assists.

Watt was very pleased with the offensive output of his team. When pressed to pick one area where he would like to see improvement over last year's championship team, Watt picked goal scoring.

"Last year we were grinders and had to work hard for everything," Watt said. "This year I would like to improve our offence while maintaining our excellent defensive record."

Watt was also pleased with the power play. Last year Toronto had the best power play in the country, scoring on a remarkable 36 percent of the time when they had a man advantage. If last night's game is any indication, the Blues have lost nothing from their power play. They scored twice in three tries and controlled the puck effectively throughout each manpower advantage.

Watt still has 27 players on the roster and will have to cut five before the season opener. He expects to be down to his final roster before the Blues travel to Michigan to compete in an invitational tournament at Michigan State.

Scar. Clinches First

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

Scarborough College has clinched first place in interfaculty football's "A" division by virtue of their 35-0 shellacking of the Engineers Wednesday at Scarborough.

The win leaves Scarborough with a perfect 4-0 record, while the second place Engineers have dropped to 2-2. Although the Engineers can still mathematically tie for first place, a tie would be broken in favour of Scarborough because they have now beaten the Engineers twice.

Scoring for Scarborough were halfback Shand McKee, with three touchdowns and halfback Russ Henderson with two.

Not only have Scarborough won their first place in their first season in the "A" division, they have also clinched a "bye" into the championship game, when they will meet the winner of the semi-final between the second and third place finishers.

In the other "A" division game Wednesday, defending champion Victoria College defeated St. Mike's 3-0 on the strength of a 35-yard field goal by Don Patterson. Bill Mighon of Victoria played a strong game, playing defensive corner, offensive guard, and snapping on punts. He made three personal quarterback sacks.

Victoria and St. Mike's now have identical 1-3 records.

Welcome home Hairy

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN
"Hairy Parrot" pranced onto the football field Saturday afternoon at Varsity Stadium to accept an award on behalf of Knox College, whose float was judged the best of Saturday's Sesquicentennial homecoming parade.

The Knox float, sporting a banner entitled "U of T Colosseum Kicking Students," featured "Hairy Parrot," (a student dressed up in appropriate birdlike attire). Another student was dressed as "Emperor John Evans" and a skit was performed on the float celebrating U of T's involvement in football, basketball and soccer.

Forestry's float was runner-up. The "Pokey Pulp and Paper Mill" entertained approximately 1,000 enthusiastic spectators lining the parade route along Bloor, Bay, College, St. George and Devonshire Streets as the forestry students used a power saw to cut down several trees planted on their float.

BIG-WIG JUDGES

The Pharmacy and Nursing floats tied for third in the balloting by judges Alfred Miller, Assistant Dean of Engineering, Joan Foley, Principal of Scarborough College, Anna Young, President of the U of T Alumni Association, A. B. B. Moore, Chancellor of U of T, and Brian Hill, Vice-President of SAC.

Pharmacy, which won the best-float award during the last two homecoming parades, ran a skit accompanied by a song commemorating 100 years of sports at U of T. The nurses treated imaginary patients on their float deck and sang a football cheer.

Other floats in the parade were from New College, entitled the "Gnu Crowd," St. Mike's, Erindale, Woodsworth, Trinity and Victoria Colleges, along with the faculties of Engineering, Dentistry and Medicine.

A number of football alumni were on hand at the homecoming ceremonies and football game.

Fred Doty, father of the Varsity Blues' Tobin Doty, thought Varsity played well in their victory over York. When asked whether the game has improved since the 1940s when he was the team's QB, Doty answered in the affirmative. He said he felt the coaching today "is much better because it's more specialized."

BLUES NO. 1

Ian Clark, captain of the 1948 championship team, said that "man for man, Blues are the best college team in the country. Their quarterback mixes plays well and throws accurately. The linemen have great lateral movement."

Tommy Waldron, who played both quarterback and fullback for Blues during the late 1940's was pleased with halfback John Goodrow. "He plays like a seasoned player."

Five regions better for Canada, Ryan says

By ROBERTA CLARE

The British North America Act "compromise," the charges against the forefathers of Confederation and the "subtle and profound differences" underlying national unity were examined by federalist Claude Ryan Saturday at Convocation Hall.

Claude Ryan, editor of the Montreal newspaper Le Devoir and member of the Quebec Liberal Party addressed 160 delegates of Alternatives Canada, the Canadian University Students' Symposium. Speaking in French, Ryan's message was translated into English through earphones for the participants.

NATIONALISM AMBIGUOUS

Two ambiguous concepts of nationalism have existed since pre-confederation days, Ryan claimed. The dualism, between federal and provincial power, he explained, emerged from the implications of confederation: would the centralized authority respect the rights of the provinces?

Ryan charged the fathers of confederation with failing to clarify the nature of the federal authority.

He reminded the audience that "public opinion in Quebec was largely in favor of confederation."

Ryan argued that the balance between the two concepts of power has been maintained for over 110 years. "Up until now the country has worked because the federal Liberal party has put their differences aside." The Conservative and NDP parties, he claimed have failed "to put the people under an umbrella."

Ryan also maintained that "Quebec is the only province that fought to protect the interests of the provinces."

Ryan called for a new federal system. "The separatists represent only 25 to 30 per cent of the Quebec population" he reminded the audience. If those who favor the federal system can get the co-operation of others across the country, then "we will be able to get a renewal of the federal system" Ryan said.

FIVE REGIONS

Ryan proposed four fundamental objectives to "clear the road to a new federal system."

The provinces must regroup into five regions to insure a centralization of government, he said. To secure the recognition of provincial rights, the sharing of federal and provincial powers under Articles 91 and 92 of the BNA Act must be revised. Every time the federal government interferes in provincial matters "that are none of their business," there exists the threat of separation, Ryan stated.

Ryan called for a basic statement of language rights in the constitution. Opposed to Bill 101, he maintained that every French and English-speaking child should have the right to be educated in his or her mother tongue.

Moreover, Ryan insisted that the legal system must be reviewed if it is to be accepted by Quebec. Finally, he called for the acceptance by the provinces of "pooling our natural resources."

"If we cannot agree in these four fundamental objectives and cannot make clear what was constituted in 1867, then there is little hope of keeping this country together," Ryan concluded.

Ryan was optimistic about the future of Canada: "There is a greater acceptance of French than when I started out in public affairs 30 years ago." He cited Calgary where "there are now six French elementary schools. 90 per cent of the students come from English speaking families."

He added that 90 per cent of French families in Quebec want their children to have some educational grounding in English.

QUEBEC MISINTERPRETED

According to Ryan, the Parti Quebecois (P.Q.) tends to assume their opinion represents all of Quebec. Ryan reminded the delegates that this is not the first time that Quebec has been misinterpreted. Until recently, he said, Trudeau claimed that his view was the dominant one in Quebec and had dismissed the PQ as "a minute group."

At this point University of Quebec delegate and PQ member Jean Renaillard rose and affirmed Ryan's comment: "That's how the anglophones got fooled! How can you separate what has never been united?"

Ryan referred to Trudeau as "the savior on the scene." Daniel Ryan, President of Jeunesse Quebec Canada, a McGill University student, and nephew of Claude Ryan, stated: "Ryan believes that Trudeau has no contact with Quebec. Moving back and forth from Montreal to Ottawa, he has lost all reality." He suggested that Canadians "forget the frustrations, negotiate, re-examine, then we will find the solutions."

Patrick Malloy, President of the Executive Committee of Alternatives Canada commented: "We have not taken an ideological stance. The individuals at this conference have their own objectives in the debate. We wanted to provide a forum for them."

When questioned after the seminar as to whether he planned to seek the nomination of the leadership of the Quebec Liberal Party, Claude Ryan replied that he was still uncertain. It is rumored that the party will hold its leadership convention in November of 1978.

New Co-op beats higher food prices

By TOM KUHN

Several U of T students have banded together to form a food co-op to beat higher supermarket prices and drab residence hall food.

The food co-op, located in the basement of the Newman Centre at the corner of St. George and Hoskin, was started by a second year student at Knox College, with the help of community staff at the Newman Centre.

The prices of the co-op are 30 per cent lower than that of food stores, said Howard Kwan, the Innis student who said the idea of the co-op led out of an environmental course he took last year.

Large pumpkins at 13 cents each, tomatoes, broccoli, carrots, potatoes, bananas, oranges, as well as peanuts, sunflower seeds, dates, raisins and yogurt at substantial savings are just a few of the goods available.

The co-op will stock whatever its members want. "It's really informal. The members control here," said Kwan.

Right now the co-op has thirty members. Kwan said it could easily go up to 100.

Members work two to three hours a month, which decreases as more members join. Work includes packaging, pricing, cashiering, phone work and receiving, which isn't particularly demanding, said Kwan.

"Not only Newman Centre members, but all people are welcome. We're interested in graduate students as well as undergraduate. Many graduate students have had funds cut, and this saving would help them get by," said Kwan.

Kwan pointed to a $3 million dollar co-op at Guelph University, saying the co-op movement hasn't really been very big at U of T.

"No food service is satisfactory. You always hear lots of complaints. I think that if students have input into it, it would be better," said Kwan.

Kwan said that although he was "into health food" when he conceived of the idea last year, the co-op can stock canned goods.

Other packaging, however, is out. "It sort of defeats the purpose of the co-op. We want to do as much of the work ourselves," he said.

The co-op is reached through the back door of the Newman Centre, which has donated the space free. It is open from 12-2 p.m. and 3-7 p.m. on Friday, and 11-3 p.m. on Sunday.

"We're charging students an $8.00 fee at the beginning just to get capital necessary for purchase of goods," said Kwan.

"Lots of residence people eat at residence halls, of course. But they still need small things; they'll find that here," said Kwan.

Claude Ryan reminds students that "public opinion in Quebec was largely in favor of confederation" in 1867.

Brute blowout baffler

Last Saturday night a green Ford had a tire blowout in a spectacular 360 degree spin on St. George St. in front of Roberts Library. No one was injured. The tire blew out after running over an IBM typesetting ball.

The driver of the vehicle George

Franks said, "It's the craziest thing that ever happened to me." "Who would leave a typesetting ball in the middle of the road?" he asked. The car skidded after the blowout because of slippery highways from the rainfall that evening.

THE UNIVERSITY HEALTH SERVICE?

We're located at the south-west end of the St. George Campus, with Divisions at Scarborough and Erindale Colleges, and offer fairly comprehensive office consulting facilities in general medicine, psychiatry and athletic injury. We welcome questions on health. Contraceptive information, advice and prescription are readily available. We are also pleased to try and help in any type of problem and advise appropriate referral if it does not come within our field.

A University Infirmary is available during the main academic year for which there is a nominal daily charge for care.

It is University Policy that all full-time students and their dependents should have insurance to cover medical and hospital costs in order to protect their interests and the interests of the University Community.

The University accepts no responsibility for uninsured medical expenses incurred by the student. Services rendered to uninsured persons are charged at normal rates.

There is a $12.00 Health Service Fee included in Incidental Fees which supports the provision of services not included as benefits under Provincial Insurance plans and does not include physicians' services.

Ecology upset feared at Erindale

By MIKE MOYLAN

Erindale College is up in arms over a plan by the City of Mississauga to develop a park bordering on Erindale's campus. Concerned Erindalians say the park could destroy the equilibrium of the natural ecosystem.

The plan, proposed by the Recreation and Parks Department, calls for the creation of ponds, picnic areas, a system of nature trails in the north end of the park and the construction of foot bridges over the Credit River. One of these proposed bridges allows access to Erindale College property.

Biology professor Paul Maycock says the proposed park borders on a campus research area restricted to teaching. The Report of the Task Force on Canadian Studies and the University of Toronto states that "The research area of Erindale College provides a unique and irreplaceable natural system for teaching and research. The task force strongly recommends that the University of Toronto do everything possible to ensure that this does not happen."

Vice President of the Erindale College Student Union Gord Shantz adds that this area contains valuable plant and animal life forms. He says that if this 65 acre nature reserve were lost, students and teachers would be forced to travel 200 to 300 miles to find a similar area. He also stated that the proposed footbridge adjacent to the campus borders on a "sensitive" area. He fears that in the winter this bridge will be salted, and the salt draining into the creek would destroy the Ph level and nutrient level of the soil. Also, proposed nature trails in the park would lead the public into this delicate area, he said.

However, landscape architect John Day, who works in the Open Space Division at the Administration and Planning Section of the Mississauga Recreation and Parks Department disagrees. He says the proposed parkland is owned by the Credit Valley Conservation Authority (CVCA). Therefore, his department would have to obey the rules of environmental concerns regarding fertilizers, salt, slope erosion and reforestation in their development practices in order to receive approval from the CVCA.

Day said the city of Mississauga approved approximately $500,000 in 1976 for Phase I of this park development. However, the money is being held in reserve until they are ready to proceed. Day said only the master plan has been approved, however, he doesn't know when development will begin.

Maycock feels that "you can create a park anywhere but you can't create the natural system already in existence at Erindale. The proposed park would be an artificial system with less value."

He added that Mississauga is trying to draw the campus into the orbit of the development. He pointed out that the city wants to use the Erindale College parking lot on the weekends and that in their plans for the park, they have proposed a future parking lot for Erindale on the southeastern campus, adjacent to the proposed park. He says that since the city doesn't appear to have their own resources for the park, they are using the Erindale area. This would result in the campus and the nearby forested areas "being trampled by people."

Shantz sees it as "encroachment on Erindale property," and that the natural area would deteriorate from overuse and then would be denied to students. He says Mississauga doesn't even need this extra parkland because there is so much other open space and parkland already available. He would like to see a five to 10 year moratorium on development in the Erindale area.

Day, however, insists the proposed footbridge is on public property and is not "the objective of the city to gain access to Erindale." He admitted that the city has proposed secondary parking on Erindale property on days when big events are scheduled in the park. He stated, however, that people would be going directly to the events and not to the environmental area of the campus. He added that the situation has not yet been resolved between the college and the city and that the Mississauga Commission of Recreation and Parks is hearing views on the matter.

Smith's plan for economic woes

By PETER HOHENADEL

"Our economy is foundering under a gigantic burden of debt," said Liberal leader Stuart Smith in his first appearance at U of T since becoming leader of the Opposition in the last election. In a brief talk followed by a question and answer period at Hart House last Thursday, Smith lamented the present state of the economy of Ontario, especially as it pertains to young people. He spoke of the "loss of enthusiasm and initiative" among young people that has accompanied escalating unemployment.

"There is no sense of direction in this province," Smith said, referring to the Conservative government's inability to handle unemployment. "The days of living high, of living on borrowed American dollars are over," Smith said. "Our dollar is now at 91 cents. It'll go lower unless we're prepared to show the world that this country can pull itself up by its bootstraps."

Smith offered his own scheme for overcoming Ontario's financial morass. He outlined an industrial strategy based on "knowledge intensive industries that would depend on the highly educated population of Ontario." Smith felt that such industry would help to mobilize the overabundance of university graduates in the province.

With respect to the Liberal party's stand on education, Smith was generally in agreement with the new OSAP guidelines recently introduced by Harry Parrott. "The (OSAP) program has not been working too badly in the past," Smith said. "It didn't make sense to me that people should have to borrow money before they get a grant," he said, in regard to the government's plan to allow a four year grant system before obliging students to borrow for their education.

Smith was adamant that the Liberal party gave its total support to the concept of free post-secondary education for all people, regardless of their financial means. Only a ceiling for such financial help needs to be determined, according to Smith.

The leader of the Opposition was philosophical about improving the electoral status of the provincial Liberal party with the city of Toronto. He admitted that the Liberal party had traditional roots in agricultural Ontario, in the small towns of the province. "But," he added, "maybe now that Stephen Lewis is getting out of politics, the people of Toronto will take a second look at me."

Varsity vandalized again.

Varsity vandalized again

A fresh outbreak of vandalism occurred at The Varsity offices over the homecoming weekend. The newspaper offices, which have been the target for a series of pranks over the last few weeks, were the victim of a crime of a more serious nature.

Newspaper staff arrived on Saturday morning to discover the bulletin board on the newsroom door ripped in half, the locks on two doors forced open, a file of photographic prints and negatives overturned and an enlarger lens, valued at approximately $100, stolen.

A U of T policewoman arrived on the scene several hours later and made a " cursory " examination according to accounts. On Sunday, two U of T policemen came and made a more lengthy examination. They were unable to suggest the perpetrators of the break-and-entry, but did say that one of the U of T plainclothes staff would make a thorough investigation later on in the week.

The theft of the enlarger lens was of greater concern, as photographs for the Monday edition of the paper were unable to be developed until one of the photo editors brought in his own. Once the exact value of what was stolen and destroyed is determined, it will be known whether Metro police will have to be called in.

Time for another visit with our favorite SAC president, John Tuzyk. Tell us John, is it true that you and the other members of SAC wear only leopard-spot boxer shorts to all the executive meetings?

"Why sure, they're comfortable, inexpensive and the three-way stretch elastic gives me a thrill."

Sure John, but why leopard spots?

"Well, we used to wear low-cut zebra shorts, until we discovered that three elected members were actually zebras."

Yeah, but John, surely leopard spots hamper the business of SAC meetings?

"Are you kidding? The meetings are never dull — and the executive always stays cool while discussing university problems. In fact you might say we like to air our 'beefs in briefs'."

Er, thanks John.

Today's Fascinating Fact: Guess who was seen eating at the Med-Sci cafeteria? Why it was Cher, Jackie and our favorite U of T president.

Yup, Cher was wearing an original $2,000 Bob Mackie, and Jackie was sporting her latest $1,800 Givenchy. Dr. 'E' was wearing a $65 cash-and-carry from "Elks" with ketchup stains. Says the good doctor, "I wish I could afford to dress like those gals!"

Whatever became of . . .

Natze Dog. Some remember him as a belligerent, foul-mouthed punk rocker, but few remember his sensitive portrayal of an aging spinster in The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, at the UC Playhouse.

An economics student from Vic, Natze was often seen on campus. Later, his knowledge of bizarre cult worship and his skill with switchblades led him to a highly successful career as Innis pub chef.

Later on, due to an unnatural affection for hubcaps, Natze began a new career as a combination U of T ombudsman-used car dealer.

Thus the exciting E.J. Pratt library was removed to make way for an equally exciting used car lot, where Natze sold his fair share of Chevy Novas, Chryslers and Dodge Monacos — while deftly cutting through the everyday problems of university red-tape.

Often Natze would be called in to help a student with his academic status or replace a warranty on a '68 Lincoln.

And after years of automotive trade-ins and U of T bureaucracy, the obnoxious punk-rocker has no regrets about his work. Chuckles Natze, "I just unloaded 31 hot Vegas to the Governing Council."

OPTIONS TO REALITY

Ask a liberal a difficult question and he will give you a fatuous answer.

Ask Claude Ryan how he thinks "national unity" can be preserved and he will tell you that the solution is to divide Canada into five provinces.

The idea that difficult national problems can be solved by a few "creative" people like Ryan who ignore everything around them and rely solely on flashes of inspiration betrays the elitism of the liberal position. It demonstrates a contempt for millions of ordinary people who will have to live with these "original" solutions but whose only function is to submit to the juggling and manipulation proposed by the government's creative salesmen.

Ryan's attitude at the Alternatives Canada Conference proved consistent. Juggling the country is only the first step. Another brainwave is to "make the national capital bilingual in a really vigorous fashion." According to Ryan "this would demonstrate the free association of two great communities that have agreed to join together." In other words you impose bilingualism on Ottawa and you present this as an example of "free" association.

In any case who cares if the national capital is "vigorously" bilingual? How would this alter the everyday lives of the people of Quebec, or for that matter, the people of Canada? It sounds to us like a move that only the select few who had nothing better to do on Saturday than go to the Alternatives/Options Canada Conference would appreciate. The idealism that patriots such as Ryan are supposed to exude seems as genuine to us as the sentiments that come across from a Coke commercial.

National unity is a phoney issue, as phoney in fact as the hostility and "misunderstanding" that is supposed to exist between anglophones and francophones. The rich "anglos" in Westmount for example have more in common with their francophone counterparts than they have with English-speaking workers in Ontario. The slightest hint that American capital would be withdrawn from Quebec had francophone Levesque hustle down to anglophone New York in the shortest time possible.

Meanwhile on the front-page of the brand new Sunday Star, that other original thinker, the Prime Minister was telling us "You're soft."

Creative people all of them. We only wish we could be as free with their careers as they are with our lives.

SAC budget politics

The SAC budget meeting last Wednesday night was highly indicative of where the student body of this university is going. As I did the reporting on it, I feel it my duty as a student at this institution to add another dimension to what was printed in Friday's issue.

On the economics of deficit financing, I have nothing but praise for those who decided that "being in the hole" is better than cutting services to which the student body has a right. Picture, if you will, a situation wherein taxes are collected from a population with a limited income (thereby narrowing the choice in their partaking in outside activities). These taxes are then used by its elected representatives to provide some kind of social and intellectual amusement. But, all of a sudden, the governing body realizes to its apparent horror that it can no longer afford to spend money on all these activities. It can no longer afford to send its emissaries to conferences. But it can also see that its income has remained static for some time. Well, instead of removing some of the services, thereby depriving the population of the amusements for which it has paid, it decides to raise its taxes by a nominal amount, and cut its non-salaried members' honoraria by an equally small amount and, presto, everything is hunky-dory again.

Well folks, this is not exactly what happened last Wednesday evening. We have in the midst of our government balanced-budget freaks! (It is amazing, is it not, that these same people go screaming to the Ontario government for more money and attack it for the height of its spending ceilings on education — don't misunderstand, that is very honourable but please, a little consistency.)

Besides the economics of budgeting, I must take issue with the conduct of certain members of that committee. Although it is obvious that salty language and hot tempers will flare up at any such event, there is (or should be) a limit to the personal insults and sexist remarks at such meetings. "Don't worry, your presence on the Women's Commission is merely transitory and no one really cares what you or your commission does anyway," said one rather vociferous member. (Correct, Mr. Treacy?) "All in the name of Budget Cuts" was the explanation given. Perhaps, but those comments are both irrelevant and immaterial and I could name at least a half-dozen commissions (including the Governing Council) whose members are equally transitory.

I shall now be accused of misinterpreting the facts and taking life far too seriously. Perhaps, but this is "all in the name of Freedom of the Press."

Paradigms of the Present

By MARIO CUTAJAR

"Science," said Jacob Bronowski, author of The Ascent of Man and patron saint of scientists with a yearning to be humanists, "is the greatest discovery made by scientists." Participants in last Thursday's day-long symposium "Paradigms of the Present" held at Scarborough College, had a chance to observe scientists restage their most important discovery.

According to Thomas S. Kuhn, a revered figure among speculative-minded scientists, a paradigm is "an achievement which some particular scientific community acknowledges for a time as supplying the foundation for its particular practice." Adopting this definition of a paradigm, the Scarborough symposium attempted to come to grips with the paradigms currently in use among the various scientific disciplines.

While the morning session concentrated on the development of specific paradigms in astronomy, physics and biology, the afternoon lectures dealt with topics of general interest.

"Images of Science", a lecture delivered by John Kennedy, dealt with the various views of science the scientists themselves hold. "Creativity in science and the humanities" a lecture delivered by Professor Peter Salus, pointed out that both artistic and scientific creativity is motivated not by utilitarian considerations but rather by the personal joy which the creator derives from creating.

Professor N. Rubin observed that similar theories exist in linguistics, music and the philosophy of science, which try to reduce the creative act to a rational stepwise construction of ever-increasing complexity.

He noted that such theories fail to take into account those factors which make a piece of music or a new scientific theory distinguishable from another. He suggested instead an approach that would take into consideration the multi-dimensional character of artistic and scientific creation: the relation of (in his example) a piece of music to earlier music, the relation to later pieces by other composers, the connection between the various compositions of the same composer, the social influences and so on.

By far the most provocative statements came from philosopher Ronald B. De Sousa. The talk, entitled "Evaluation of Scientific Paradigms," attempted to demonstrate in a dramatic fashion that there is no fundamental "rock-bottom" paradigm in science.

A recurring paradox in science, noted De Sousa, is the virtual ignorance of other scientific fields which some scientists claim to have and their simultaneous claim to an idea of which sciences are "best."

The criteria used to evaluate paradigms, De Sousa said, have for the most part been arbitrary. He noted that, while Plato thought the real could only be reached if one shut off the external world and relied solely on reflection, B. F. Skinner has advocated that behavior be studied solely on the basis of external observation.

De Sousa chose "explanatory priority" as his criterion for judging which science is most fundamental. "If one can show that one science is reducible to another (biology to physics and chemistry, chemistry to physics and physics to mathematics), we would be able to tell which science is most fundamental." This view, he claimed, is accepted by the majority of modern scientists and its validity, or lack of it, can be regarded as a representative test.

De Sousa then argued that physics is not the most fundamental science. Physical laws, he said, need to be preceded by an experimental method. Moreover, De Sousa said physics itself "may be gone beyond," its paradigms explained in terms of information theory.

The problem of which science is most fundamental arises in a more dramatic form if one considers the problem of communicating with beings in other worlds. Such an attempt, De Sousa explained, would entail communicating to the aliens a fact which they already knew. He gave as an example of such a fact the structure of the hydrogen atom.

An immediate problem, he explained, would be sending the communication through a medium common to both humans and aliens. A more serious problem, he continued, would be formulating the structure of the hydrogen atom in terms of a paradigm recognizable to both species. Since paradigms originate from immediate experience and since beings on other worlds may have been subjected to experiences radically different from our own, De Sousa suggested that the aliens might have developed a series of paradigms whose temporal sequence was completely different from our own.

One could argue against this conclusion, he said, by claiming in Pythagorean fashion, that all the sciences are ultimately reducible to mathematics. However, mathematics is universal precisely because the objects it deals with are non-existent.

De Sousa's conclusion was that at best there are "isomorphisms," ways of mapping onto each other different paradigms, but that a "rock-bottom" science does not exist.

Postal workers fight back

Canadian postal workers plan a national publicity campaign to counter ads taken out in newspapers by Post Office management and business groups which blame the posties for the present predicament of the mails.

The ads, which will appear this week in various newspapers across the country, will try "to deliver" the mails from "the many administrative and legal constraints which are at the root of the present dispute." They will also point out that post office negotiations are being hampered by the existence of its many masters — the Public Service Commission, the Ministry of Public Works, the Treasury Board and Parliament have all intervened in post office operation.

"The real problem of the post office — and the government is perfectly aware of this — is administrative incoherence and incompetence," according to Clement Morel, director of the Quebec section of the postal union. "And we're not the only ones to say so. A veritable avalanche of government studies — in all 17 in the last eight years — relate the problems of the Post Office with bad administration."

The problem of getting grievances across to the public in face of almost unbelievable press distortion was brought out in a recent incident at a Saskatoon post office.

A two-day walkout by inside employees there was prompted by toilets not working, according to local media coverage. The reports said workers had walked off because toilets had been plugged with rolls of toilet paper.

In fact, employees walked off because of elimination of dayshift positions requiring overworked employees to accept extra overtime; harassment and intimidation of employees, particularly women employees, by supervisors; and irregular scheduling of part-time workers. And even the toilet roll story was empty — toilets in the post office had separate sheet dispensers rather than rolls of paper.

The postal workers hope to use the ads to suggest precise solutions to problems in the post office. "Every time negotiations have come up, the government has launched an advertising campaign, blaming us for the inadequacies of the mails. It just spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to tell citizens that things aren't going well in the Post Office. Now we, with much more modest resources, are going to try to tell people there are solutions," said one spokesperson for the postal union.

Immigration bill

OTTAWA (CUP) — Immigration minister Bud Cullen was on the road again this week trying to explain the rationale behind Canada's new restrictive immigration legislation.

"The number of people who would like to settle in Canada will exceed our ability to accept them," Cullen explained. In 1976, the government reduced by more than 20 percent the number of people entering the country, claiming numbers of immigrants affect the rate of unemployment. The 150,000 people immigrating represented a 15 percent drop in the average of the last 10 years, when the country welcomed immigrants as a source of skilled and unskilled labour.

The reduction in immigration is to be accomplished through Bill C-24, passed earlier this year. Critics of the bill have pointed out a number of discriminatory clauses, particularly sections dealing with deportation and acceptance of political refugees and suspected "subversives".

"We will continue to welcome immigrants as in the past," Cullen said, "but under the new law the number we admit will be more carefully planned in line with the needs and capacity of our country."

vargfea

By WAYNE OLSHESKI

Undoubtedly, with the P.Q. victory in November 1976, many Canadians felt that a political crisis faced Canada. Of no exception, the university community recognized the crisis. Acting in its traditional role, it discussed the possibility of creating a forum to seriously analyze the political problems at hand, and of subsequently educating the public.

And so was born the idea of OPTIONS — a conference on the Future of the Canadian Federation. In January 1977, a committee was formed, comprising of John Evans, President of the U of T, George Ignatieff, Provost of Trinity College, Lonna Marsden, Chairman, Department of Sociology, U. of T., and George Leonidas of the Faculty of Management Studies, U. of T. The committee was co-ordinated by Bill Saywell, Associate Professor of the Department of East Asian Studies.

According to Saywell, the presentations at 'Options' were to fulfill the criteria of appealing to the general public, of being national in scope, and of expressing expertise in the given areas. Thus, a co-ordinator was chosen from each province (including the Yukon and the North West Territories), to select two hundred-plus leaders of the Canadian community to act as delegates on October 14-15.

This detailed selection process was aimed at analytical discussion of the Canadian federation rather than emotional — and this, it did achieve. However, many participants felt that the delegates did not reflect the Canadian community as a whole.

The funding for the conference — including wine at lunches and a fine banquet — was provided by the Donner Canadiana Foundation and five national corporations, duly acknowledged in the conference's handbook 'Options'. In addition, the committee of 'options' have applied to the Secretary of State for financial aid in the translation services employed throughout the conference.

One of the weaknesses of the conference, and one especially criticized by Darcy McKeough, Treasurer of Ontario, was the abstract nature of many paper presentations to the various sessions. But this 'abstractness' contributed to the very lifeblood of the conference as evidenced in the question period following the presentations, and especially in the workshops that were thematically related to the preceding sessions. What was this lifeblood? Many delegates admitted to "being confused" partly as a result of the presentations, and accordingly a strong appeal was made to give meaning through considering the practical implications, and by relating it all in human terms — and not, as described by N. Schumacher, a distinguished Canadian lawyer, "in terms of wooden pawns on a chess board."

The result of attempting to translate the ideas presented into real terms was, it seems, to achieve an understanding of the problems. The three concerns that found root in the workshops and question periods, and appeared to be the prevalent themes that permeated the entire conference, were the existence of minority rights, regional disparities and needs, and perhaps the greatest concern of all, the lack of communication within and without the province of Quebec.

Although approaching the question from two different perspectives — one historical, the other sociological — Professor Ramsay Cook, York University, and Yves Martin, recteur, Université de Sherbrooke, (paper read by L. Kerwin), agreed that the nationalist revivals that exist in Canada today "are derived from different concepts of the meaning of 'nation' and are aimed at the achievement of conflicting goals." In the case of Quebec, it is a pre-determined nation — linguistic and ethnic characteristics pre-determine membership in nations. In contrast, English Canadian provinces have "acted on the principle that Canada was, or ought to be, a culturally homogenous nation."

As a result, Yves Martin contended that English Canadians approach the minority groups in Canada, (and most particularly in Quebec), with three distortions that hamper any resolution of the present separatist crisis. It was apparent to Martin that Quebec strives to positively determine the political arrangement which will permit it to assure its future as a distinct society. He believed that the true question of Quebec is not language but power — something the federal power fails to realize. Secondly, Martin believed that English Canada does not make the "effort to identify all the positive dynamics by which Quebec searches for a better arranging of its political future — for itself, but not against everybody." Thirdly, Martin believed there is no evidence that "Quebec is inspired by sentiments of a closing up to the world."

In effect, English Canada is asked to discard its old attitudes of Quebec. It takes a positive attitude by ridding itself of the misconceptions or distortions that Yves Martin pointed out. As a first step, the problem should be approached objectively, in an effort to find solutions. An affirmation of these Quebec principles would, in addition, strengthen the minority positions in the rest of Canada — something that is in want because of Americanization and other dominating influences.

N. A. Cochrane, President of the University of Calgary pointed out that Canada "is a country of minorities from sea to sea." In the final analysis, according to Ramsay Cook, since neither Quebec nor Canada is culturally homogenous, "claims to nationhood, if they are to rest on anything more substantial than the tyranny of majorities, must find sanctions of some other sort." Minority rights, then, appear to be a most fundamental concern in determining the future of the Canadian federation.

Throughout the entire conference, a strong case was also presented for a re-evaluation of regional differences. Darcy McKeough suggested as a guide that whatever provinces "can afford to do in a regional way, should do it" and whatever Canadians "must do in a federal way" must be done.

Perhaps the most enlightening paper on the subject was presented by Roy Romanow, Deputy Premier and Attorney General of Saskatchewan. Romanow stressed the fact that the West has a distinct identity that perceives not a dual-nation theory, but a multi-cultural reality. In addition, Romanow contends that the West holds a strong sense of economic grievance — that has deep roots — to the point of being part of West orthodoxy: "The Last Spike signified uneven economic development." With allusions to the Canada West movement, Romanow called for the acceptance of regionalism, "not in a grudging way but with the realization that it is a vital part of what Canada really is."

The workshop chaired by Paul Fox, Principal, Erindale College, referred to regionalism as functional federalism — "the drawing up of a shopping list" that it was generally believed, by those in attendance, can be accommodated in Section 92.16. However, in view of such considerations as broadcast policy and pollution control that were not in existence in MacDonald's era, an amending formula to the constitution was deemed necessary.

A practical approach to extending regional powers (and thereby alleviating local grievances) was discussed — that of defining more clearly the federal power to spend money, and more particularly, the delegation of authority.

Denis Stairs, Dalhousie University, apparently disagreed with Trudeau's statement that decentralization has gone as far as possible. In his paper, "Devolution and Foreign Policy," he brought forward the notion that "the federal authorities could go much farther than they have done to date in releasing interested provinces to conduct their own relations abroad." Stairs' inclusion of immigration policy in this classification did not go over with delegate Cochrane who believed in co-ordinated regulation. However, Stairs ended on a conciliatory note, stating that measures concerning provincial relations abroad "cost Ottawa little more than the tedium of consultative effort."

The above consideration of regionalism indicates the complexity and scope of the problem confronting the Canadian federation. More importantly, the delicate inter-relationship that does exist between the federal and provincial jurisdiction suggests that regionalism is a subject that cannot be treated lightly or with indifference.

The issue that received the strongest voice was that of a lack of communication, and ultimately, an understanding, both within and without Quebec.

F. N. Ritchie, a farmer from British Columbia stated that the old prejudice against the East still exists not so much because it is real anymore, but because there exists a "frustrating lack of understanding." Ritchie stated that the best channel of communication between his province and Quebec was transitory farmworkers who express their feelings and discuss their concerns. Ritchie pointed out, however, that this mode of communication is, at best, fragmentary.

Similarly, H. Wedderburn, Halifax, felt that the problems of Quebec are articulated in "rational, reasonable terms, but this is not the message that is getting to the country." The conference failed to acknowledge the federal government's action in this respect. Although limited in its application, Secretary of State John Roberts has launched a student exchange program. "Open House Canada" to bridge this gap in communications. It provides free transportation to students, in order to get to know others in Canada.

Frustrations with the existing channels of communication were voiced from Quebec as well. P. Laurier decried the fact that "those holding the extremist positions in Quebec are well-organized and have the attention of the media." Laurier believed the other interest groups are "not organized nor cohesive." Laurier overlooked recent developments of Pro-Canada groups in Quebec who announced, at a recent news conference, that although they were not planning to merge, they were pooling their talents to fight for Canada in the referendum. The various groups, according to the October 14, 1977 Globe & Mail, plan on dividing various tasks among them. Therefore, positive steps have been taken in the direction Laurier indicated, the degree and extent of which are yet to be determined.

Laurier believed that the lack of communication in Quebec poses the greatest threat to the Canadian federation. Laurier maintained that the majority of Quebec does not want either the status quo or independence. Rather, he felt renegotiation of the 1867 contract is necessary — and that only this can avoid polarization. He stressed the fact that if Quebecers find themselves in the same position as they do now, after an unsuccessful referendum, they will become totally disillusioned with the federal system. Ultimately, this will lead to a heightening of the tension that presently exists.

The message is clear: Quebec wants Quebec, and at the same time, seeks to find a way of living with other people, not against them. The possible means of achieving this plan, or at least those aimed at 'OPTIONS', are a new attitude towards minority rights by English Canada, a better working arrangement at the federal level in the area of regionalism (especially, the economic implications), and an immediate and concerted effort to strive for, and maintain, communication with Quebec, for the purpose of understanding the problem.

Of course, the delegates to 'OPTIONS' realized that understanding and resolving the above problems will not in themselves create a Canadian Utopia.

However, these sensitive areas were dealt with objectively. The delegates were equipped with, or had reinforced, convictions; at least, hearing what the rest of Canada had to say served to clear up misconceptions.

Speculations about Quebec separatism were listened to intently, but not passionately. On the whole, the delegates felt a strong commitment to working within the existing framework, and with the tools at hand.

Lacoste's concern that the information gathered would not be diffused to the general public can be reconsidered. With the empathy, real concern and optimism generated at 'OPTIONS', delegates will not only shout their findings out loud, but well.

No new insight

By JOE BOLGER

Political science professor John Meisel of Queen's University provided the key speech at the opening session of the Options Conference at Convocation Hall sponsored by the University of Toronto.

Meisel, speaking during the session entitled 'Communities and Identity in Canada', spoke of the abundance of varying self-perceptions among Canadians. The other panelists involved in the session merely reaffirmed Meisel's theory by demonstrating their own lack of unanimity.

Meisel pointed out that the meaning of being Canadian varies even for the individual whether he is watching an international hockey match against the USSR, reacting to the Japanese scathing of Premier Davis or contemplating selling his cottage or property to an American.

Professor Meisel referred to the "striking heterogeneity of Canadian self-perceptions" emphasizing the overriding propensity of English Canadians to identify their values, beliefs and lifestyles with those of their American rather than French-Canadian counterparts.

Although realizing the negative implications of this, in terms of its effect on unity, he pointed to the more positive side of this state of affairs indicating that since specifically "Canadian" ideals haven't yet congealed, we have left ourselves with a great capacity to refashion and modify our goals. We as Canadians, according to Meisel, should seriously question our desire for survival, and then with a heightened awareness prepare ourselves for far-reaching and fundamental change.

Marcel Rioux, chairman of the University of Montreal's sociology department and an affirmed Parti Quebecois supporter, echoed this desire for radical change but provided a different set of alternatives for action.

Rioux warned of the domination of American culture and suggested that French and English Canadians should both set their eyes on the future and look forward to an era of "mutual acceptance and collaboration", albeit under the circumstance of political separation.

Leslie Harris, Academic vice-president of Memorial University in Newfoundland, retorted Rioux's radicalism with an idealistic view of two cultures living in peaceful co-existence on the basis of heretofore unrecognized commonalities.

ALTERNATIVES

By MICHAEL KANTER

Will the Canada which we know today still exist in 1980. In the wake of the November 15 election of the Parti Quebecois government in Quebec and its more recent mention of referendum, the national debate intensifies. Our Prime Minister (in his customary rational analysis) recently commented that although Rene Levesque is Canada's enemy, he befriends us by sparking a much needed discussion on what kind of country Canadians want. And discussion took place this weekend on several fronts at U of T.

Options Canada, a conference on national unity hosted by U of T, and its President John Evans, ran parallel with Alternatives Canada, a student symposium organized by U of T students. Alternatives began in committee. Papers were requested from many student delegates, and were gathered in booklet form prior to the conference. The papers were written on the workshop topics and other related issues and were intended to stimulate workshop discussion.

The conference got underway Thursday evening at the Park Plaza Hotel, with a speech by David Lewis, former N.D.P. leader and father of Ontario NDP leader Stephen Lewis. He noted that the P.Q. election victory was more than simply a rejection of the Bourassa government, and that the French can't be looked upon as a run-of-the-mill ethnic minority. Mr. Lewis set a conciliatory tone for the symposium, and accordingly spoke in English and French.

Almost one-quarter of the students at the conference were from Quebec and many were fully prepared to vocalize their independence stance. The workshops were conducted in both languages with simultaneous translation. Saturday morning saw two and one-half hours of lively discussion surrounding the topics "Economics and Politics of Separation and Unity" and "Models of Future Association".

One delegate suggested that central Canada possessed too strong a voice at the federal level and that a structural change might benefit our political system. Following this theme, the students discussed the need for regional representation at the economic level, and a Quebec delegate proposed that another government body be created to deal strictly with economic issues such as monetary policy and equalization of investment. It was also not surprising to hear criticism of the Senate, that famous non-active body of distinction, which delegates felt could somehow be integrated into a regional representative body.

The issue of regionalism was central in the discussion. A delegate mentioned that the emphasis on region was so strong that the federal government was being sacrificed. An issue of contention was how to agree on regions. Predictably enough, Quebec insisted on its uniqueness, and not to be outdone, Alberta wondered aloud whether it would accept "Prairie" status.

The question of how Quebec should be represented at the federal level was also mentioned. It was suggested that if the Senate was revitalized on a regional basis the House of Commons could become a body with equal representation of English and French. This plan was unacceptable to many English students who mentioned the multi-cultural character of Canada.

The very basic question of what kind of country Canada is, was one which the students wrestled with. The West and to a lesser extent Ontario are reluctant to treat the French in a special manner. In many cases the viability of bilingualism is questioned. It was mentioned that in many western areas, it is unrealistic to foresee bilingualism as a goal. Are the French, due to their historical role, assigned a special place in all parts of Canada? Does this special place grant them educational rights? What of the Ukrainians who today constitute a significant minority in the west?

The delegates from Quebec were often the most vocal. Although it was the general consensus that the status quo is unacceptable, the Quebec students felt that circumstances have now taken a sure turn. The Quebecois students were a well-researched group, prepared to discuss, but also confident that times have changed. The tone of one Quebec delegate was indicative. He noted that the problems of Canada can be solved after independence. As the national debate in Canada takes place, the referendum draws near. English Canadians feel the referendum to be a kind of answer to the problem. Discuss, convince, and then hold the referendum.

But many Quebecois students do not see the referendum as a final act. It is part of the inevitable reorganization which must take place. If separatism seemed a distant, radical solution just a short while ago, Rene Levesque has brought a kind of credibility and inevitability to the separation option.

When discussing the English minority in Quebec, an English student from that province mentioned the exodus of English and his concern for a solution to that problem. The student voiced his concern this way: "We want to stay. Can it not be arranged to give the French rights in other provinces so that we can have ours?" Surprisingly enough there was not much help or even sympathy offered to this student. Another delegate said that the English must learn to live in the Quebec environment in the same way as the French minorities have had to live in other provinces. It was generally assumed that the English must give up their position of dominance in that province and allow the French to take over the reins of control.

Wendy Bellack, one of the public relations co-ordinators of Alternatives Canada and a major force behind the conference, was happy with its progress. She felt that people were really listening to each other and becoming more aware of the various problems to be dealt with. Although she recognized that students have no direct political input in the system, she felt the conference to be a valuable experience. Students would return to their homes and carry on the discussion at their schools across the country. "We do not expect to propose any solutions," she indicated, but added that student input is nevertheless important.

the summer as an idea hatched by students. They presented their thoughts to Dr. Evans, who lent his support to the idea. The initial notion was translated into reality this weekend as over 160 students from across the country arrived to discuss the Confederation "crisis".

The focus of the symposium lay in the workshops, where such topics as "Regionalism" and "The Economics and Politics of Separation and Unity" were discussed. The students, mainly from political science, economics and history faculties, were recruited during the summer, after the organizing committee of Alternatives Canada contacted the staff of university departments.

Students suggested by faculty were contacted by the Alternatives ts at 'Options'

However, Harris, after criticizing both Rioux and Meisel for depicting Canada as a divided country seemed to contradict his own thesis by referring to his fellow native Newfoundlanders as 'subjects' and 'have-nots' within the federal context.

Yet another analysis of the Canadian identity issue came from Keith Spicer, Canada's former Commissioner of Official Languages. With a somewhat humorous touch, Spicer likened the many colloquia on Canadian unity to a series of psychotherapeutic sessions. Referring to a theme previously portrayed by Margaret Atwood, Spicer said that we as Canadians tend to see ourselves as losers. While basking in our anguish we have institutionalized this search for identity, he says. The search itself has become the therapy. This massive, often self-imposed psychological stumbling block must be overcome he asserts, for Canadians to realize their potentialities.

In a more substantive vein, Spicer attacked the P.Q.'s for their paranoia and their "shortsighted views of English Canada." They are, he suggests, "intoxicating the spirit of Quebecers." As a result they will, according to Spicer, become victims of their own mythologies.

The slate of speakers was rounded out by Peter Ernerk, a member of the Legislative Assembly of the North-West territories and Manon Vennal, directeur general, Centre de Linguistique de l'Entreprise. Ernerk provided the Eskimo perspective on the Canadian federation while Vennal spoke of those problems which have plagued the Francophones in the business community.

The most striking aspect of this session was the affirmation of Meisel's theory of varying perceptions. The fact was that the panel of speakers, representing different regions and factions of the Canadian population provided a wide variety of views about the country and envisioned an equally wide spectrum of futures.

In the larger context of the conference, this discussion could be considered nothing more than a background session intended for the restatement of previously known thoughts and sentiments. Certainly no profound new insights or options were held out for us. Maybe, as Keith Spicer might suggest, it should be time to change the therapy before either our already infected cultural arteries harden in a fixed state or we experience political dismemberment.

By RANDY WINTER

Science makes strange bedfellows. Such strangely diverse elements as pollution and monotheism were linked to the alphabet in a Sesquicentennial lecture given by Professor R. K. Logan at New College last Wednesday afternoon.

The lecture, entitled "Alphabet: Mother of Invention," sought to explain why science blinds us to some problems. Logan, who describes himself as a theoretical physicist, said it was concern for the direction in which science is leading us which brought him to the ideas discussed in the lecture.

Logan traced the progress from hieroglyphics to phonetics to the Greek alphabet, relating its hierarchical and classifiable nature to that of monotheism and codified law. He cited Moses and the Ten Commandments as an embodiment of the interrelationship.

Logan said that as the representation of a word went from a single unique character to a collection of "non-unique" meaningless letters, emphasis was put on the visual and the abstract. "The Greeks invented visual space," commented spectator Marshall McLuhan. Logan called spelling "a paradigm for logic" because of the way words are built up from letters. He added that by putting their learning on paper, by separating themselves from it, the Greeks were able to study things more objectively.

Logan went on to describe the different functions of the "left and right brain hemispheres." The right side is used in pattern recognition — for getting an overview of a situation, he said. The left side performs the logical functions such as reading, writing and arithmetics. The alphabet, with its inherent logical reasoning, produces a "tilt" in usage toward the left hemisphere. This increase in linear, logical thinking was enhanced by the invention of print, partly explaining the scientific revolution which followed Gutenberg.

Unfortunately, this tilt to the left created a corresponding reduction in right-brain usage said Logan. Thus the linear thinker tries to solve problems without the benefit of an overview. He used the illustration of mercury. It must be disposed of cheaply, and is simply dumped in rivers, with no thought for the consequences. Television, which demands pattern recognition, seems responsible for both the change in attitude towards the environment and reduced ability to read, according to Logan.

Logan concluded by stressing the speculative nature of the lecture and said he hoped to provoke thought. The discussion that ensued was evidence of his success.

The Faculty Reform Caucus (FRC) is trying to "get organized" and come back to life.

The small group of U of T faculty members, now numbering three, came into existence 10 years ago to support the U of T students who were occupying Simcoe Hall demanding daycare facilities. They also joined students in opposing the U of T administration in its attempts to restrict undergraduate and community access to Robarts Library in the early seventies.

Beginning within the U of T Faculty Association (UTFA) as a caucus of people who were dissatisfied with the "let's play ball with the administration attitude," the FRC wanted to create an organized voice to take stands on important political issues on campus.

"The FRC moves from semi-crisis to semi-crisis; it organizes around single issues," said Frank Cunningham, member of the FRC steering committee.

"It has never been a tight organization, with restricted membership — whoever comes to the steering committee meetings is a member," Membership fluctuates according to the issue around which the FRC is organizing, Cunningham stated.

The main activities of the membership are organizing telephone campaigns to other faculty members, painting placards and participating in demonstrations, such as last year's October 14 National Day of Protest.

Recently, however, the issues taken up have been those that caught the interest of one or another member of the steering committee, according to Peter Fitting, steering committee member and member of the UTFA executive.

"Usually, FRC response to issues depends on the views of the two, three, or four members who attend the steering committee meetings," he said. Fitting and Cunningham are planning a meeting for the end of October in their efforts to revitalize FRC. Preparations for a more formal conference will be discussed, at which this year's FRC program will be proposed.

Contemporary Woodwinds

By JACKIE LONDON

An exceptional array of talent was brought together at Town Hall Saturday for the second of the new music concert series.

Outstanding among the works was a double woodwind quintet by David Jaeger. Jaeger avoided the obvious temptations such an ensemble would present. Instead he applied himself seriously to his task, producing many fresh effects and combinations before flowing majestically over long phrases to a close.

The piece unfortunately was marred by a weakness in the writing just before the closing section.

Young composers who are wont to fall prey to the pessimism of the day and claim that it is impossible to produce new music that is "beautiful" would do well to look into writing for woodwinds.

Of the four works for winds heard at this event only one violated the beguiling and serene character of the instruments. This was Bruce Mather's Eine Kleine Bläsermusik, which had some painfully shrill moments. The piece nonetheless captured the listener with its intriguing rhythmic changes.

Norwegian-Italian composer Antonio Bibalo was surely inspired when he wrote his Sonata Number 2: Astrale. Playful, charming, at times dark, it was that musical rarity today, a contemporary piece that seemed "just right".

Polish composer Włodzimierz Kotonski's Musical Games was something of a novelty piece. A deck of cards dealt to the performers on stage determined the order and instrumentation of the musical elements. Fortune was kind to Kotonski on this occasion: the cards dealt the performers and the audience an enjoyable production.

In this as in earlier works, Kotonski displayed an attributing of human qualities to the instrument to the point where he almost had the audience believing those instruments had human qualities.

Barry Truax's Nautilus for percussion and four channel tape was well chosen. Presented in the middle of the program, it brought a needed relief from the woodwinds. The speakers distributed at the front, middle, and rear of the audience produced a "snow" effect that had people looking at the ceiling as if the sounds were coming from there.

Percussionist Russell Harlenberger was given the choice of 1,132 possible combinations to play on four familiar percussion instruments (drums, woods, hard metals and soft metals) and used his opportunities well.

The stars of the evening were the five superb musicians who make up the justly celebrated Norwegian Wind Quintet. Earlier in the week the quintet presented a breathtaking workshop in wind instruments that was more in the nature of a performance marathon. The ease with which they handled difficult passages had the students of the U of T Faculty of Music in raptures. During the intermission, these introverted virtuosos performed no less than the Villalobos Quintet!

On disc or live, woodwinds capture the sensitive ear.

An interlude with Globe's music critic

By JACKIE LONDON

Contemporary music fans who have often expressed a wish to inflict bodily harm on Globe and Mail music critic John Kraglund missed an opportunity when he mingled at intermission on Saturday.

Kraglund is a genial man who says delightfully outrageous things. A music critic for 20 years, he admitted he disliked most new music and argued convincingly against a current theory that receiving bad criticism deters young talent.

He feels an obligation to review new music no matter what his tastes because musicians prefer receiving a bad press to being ignored.

However he insisted on his right to put the whole thing in historical perspective. Unless a work is new or interesting, he does not see it as particularly worthy and cites works of as recent a vintage as 10 years ago which have come and gone in one night. He doubts even if one new composition a year will survive 50 years from now. If a work is disliked today and forgotten tomorrow, what is its value, he argued.

Women's Studies verges on sexism

By RHONDA TEPPER

The Women's Studies Program, held at New College, is not as well-known as it could and should be, according to program chairman Professor Chaviva Hosek. Moreover, the bulk of students enrolled in the program are women, she said.

Male students have a responsibility to understand women's situations if they intend to work with women in their careers, according to Hosek. With so many female students entering the sciences, law and economics, she said, it's time to recognize "the other half of the real world."

The program offers courses from the departments of Philosophy, Sociology and English, with emphasis on sexuality, family relationships and women in literature. One course (HIS359Y) examines the history of women in Canada.

The program began in 1972, said Hosek, when a few courses from several departments merged into the Women's Studies area, and speakers were invited to talk about the significance of women in society. Since then more departments have offered related courses, and Hosek hopes that even more will become involved in the program.

Hosek is optimistic about the variety of courses already offered and says that more may be added if there is sufficient student interest.

At the end of last year 400 students were involved in the program. Seventy students have enrolled in the current introductory courses.

We the people of Canada

By KEN WHITEHURST

The Canadian Alternative Party (CAC) has issued The Canadian Declaration of Independence, which promises a tri-lingual language policy, admittance of the Yukon and Northwest Territories into the Canadian union as provinces, and 100 percent employment.

The declaration begins, "Nation of nations among nations, Canada, born of all ethnic origins and every religious faith, united in God and balance by the Trinity; Left, Right and Central Politics, is Independent, with individual sexual equality for each Man, Woman and Child."

The party declares that "Canadians have the right to speak 'Canadian' or 'Canadien' and that a Canadian-Canadian dictionary should be published. It also calls for the formation of the Canadian Translation Service to assure that all laws are translated from English to Canadian and from French to Canadian.

Esperanto, which the declaration says is a "universal language appreciative and common to most languages on earth," would be Canada's third language.

The CAC would reduce the number of Canadian Senators to one from each province — for a total of 12 senators after the Yukon and the North West Territories enter the union.

Elections for all levels of government would be held every three years on February 15, which will also be declared a national holiday called "Flag Day."

One hundred percent employment is promised by the CAC, which says it will pay each Canadian citizen $2,500 a year "to obey the law, conserve energy, recycle and buy Canadian." They claim that government employment of all citizens will make the country work more efficiently and would eventually mean pay raises for all citizens.

The CAC, in an effort to eliminate the chance that citizen employees might strike, would create an "All-Canadian Union". No chapter or local will be allowed to bankrupt the nation. The Canadian forces will run the post office and essential transportation and communication services.

Pot-smokers will be pleased to know that the CAC will create The Canadian Liquor, Cannabis, Cigarette Control Board.

The CAC plans to replace Canada's strife-ridden prison system with Primal Therapy sessions for all criminals.

Canada needs, argues the CAC, a multi-million dollar promotional campaign to encourage Canadians to buy Canadian-made goods. They would encourage Canadian enterprise by giving special tax status to Canadian companies.

An annual stage show would give Canadian performers a chance to perform, and the Canadian film industry would be encouraged to make movies of this stage show, which the CAC thinks would be popular because of the excellence of Canadian talent. They would also establish a permanent "Team Canada" hockey team that would be made up of Canada's best players, who would compete against other national teams.

Social insurance cards would also serve as All-Canadian Union cards, government employee number cards and Canadian Alternative Party cards, which the party says would be free and would give them "23 million paid-up Canadian members."

The declaration concludes, "Canada is sexy, political and religious! Our natural National organization is inspired. No enemies, just very urgent problems to solve. Rene Levesque, a great 'Canadien', is The Left Wing Leader, Bill Davis is The Right Wing Leader and Pierre Trudeau is Leader of the Centre."

Michael John Houlton is the head of the party and is his party's candidate for parliament in the Ottawa Centre riding. His party's slogan is, "God; Help Us, Help You, Help Ourselves!"

Blues Beat Yeomen; Clinch Playoff Spot

By HOWARD DEAN
and KEN WHITEHURST

The Varsity Blues plowed the York Yeomen 28-6 in a football game, played at Varsity Stadium on Saturday. The win assured them a second place finish in the O.Q.I.F.C. (West) and maintained their first place standing in that division of the C.I.A.U.

The passing of Varsity quarterback Dan Feraday accounted for most of the Blues' offence. He completed 14 of 23 passes for 242 yards. Feraday's pass attack was more diversified than usual, as he fired passes to six different receivers.

"Our secondary receivers are getting a lot of work now and that ought to help our passing game. Those two new kids — Dominico and Magee — they played super," remarked Feraday.

Chris Kotsopoulos, Mark Magee and Joe Hawco caught three passes each for 69, 32, and 23 yards, respectively. Sam Sinopoli caught one for 23 yards.

Passes from Feraday to John Goodrow and Kotsopoulos resulted in two of the Blues' three touchdowns.

The Blues' running game was not as effective, however. John Goodrow had a mediocre day but was still the Blues' leading ground-gainer with 82 yards from 23 carries. He fumbled twice during crucial plays. York recovered the first fumble, but the next time Dan Dominico recovered for U of T.

Joe Hawco, ran the ball ten times for 23 yards. His running showed great promise in earlier games, but as he put it, "Call it an off day. I wasn't getting my knees up high enough, and the defenders kept tripping me up."

The Blues' defensive backfield had a good day hauling in five interceptions.

Varsity defensive back Eugene Nakatsu had two interceptions to round out a day of tough defensive play by him. Nakatsu commented that he thought his play was "alright."

Jim Mossop, Bruce Pollock and John Brown each had an interception.

The Blues started the scoring half way into the first quarter with Mike Sokovnin's 25-yard field goal. This play was set up by a 35 yard pass to Chris Kotsopoulos.

After being stalled for two series of plays, the Blues finally put together a touchdown drive that was aided by a short York punt and a facemask penalty.

The drive covered 26 yards in four plays and climaxed with an 18 yard touchdown pass to Chris Kotsopoulos. With only seconds remaining in the first half and after four consecutive pass plays, John Goodrow ran one yard for a touchdown. The convert was good, and at the half, the Blues led 17-0.

A 27 yard field goal by York's Bill Patskau put York on the scoreboard in the third quarter.

John Brown's interception at the end of the third quarter set up a single by Sokovnin. The point was conceded by York, after Sokovnin narrowly missed a 36 yard field goal.

York player Dan Carnegie thought the ball was dead when he caught it, so he tossed the ball towards the referee. Seeing that the U of T players were lunging for the "fumbled" ball, he picked it back up and was collared in the end zone.

The next time the Blues had the ball, they tested some new plays. One of those plays was a reverse play run by Sam Sinopoli that gained 12 yards. Others were passes to Sinopoli and Hawco. Feraday then returned with a pass to the ever faithful Kotsopoulos.

After an incomplete pass intended for Mark Magee, the Blues were forced to settle for a field goal. The score stood at 21-3.

The Yeomen countered on their next series of plays by completing four of seven passes. This effort ended with a 22 yard field goal by Phil Patskau, closing the gap to 15 points.

U of T's last touchdown came after an interception by Toronto's Jim Mossop. Goodrow caught a screen pass and ran it 47 yards to the York Hawco gets the block he needs to turn the corner.

18 yard line. Three plays later, he fumbled on the York 5 yard line, but the Blues recovered. He made up for this fumble by scoring, on the next play after catching an 8 yard pass.

The point after attempt was good, and the final score was Toronto 28 and York 6.

In preparation for next week's game against the Western Mustangs, the Blues tried several new plays and defensive alignments. "You can practice all week, but it is in the game where new players gain their experience. You can't do a lot of live action during the week with your own team because you double the chances of injury," commented Varsity head coach Ron Murphy.

Western, now rated No. 2 in the nation behind the Varsity Blues, are 5 and 1 for the season. "I'm worried; they have a good club, they have good passing, they have good running and they have a good defense," Murphy said.

Toronto's hottest, humblest, but least supported team will play the Western Mustangs this Saturday in London. Their next home game will be an O.Q.I.F.C. (West) Play-off, on Saturday, October 29.

In conclusion: In other action Western remained two points behind league leading Toronto with a 22-15 victory over Windsor. The win set the stage for next week's game to decide first place. The Blues need only a tie to clinch first.

Laurier Golden Hawks moved into sole possession of third place with a convincing 28-10 win over McMaster. Guelph Gryphons continued their improved play with a 18-6 triumph over Waterloo.

3-5 Is Air Tight

By JIM O'LEARY

Despite yielding an average of less than 10 points per game and allowing only five touchdowns in their first six games, the Blues introduced a new defensive alignment in their weekend game. When faced with an obvious passing situation the conventional four-four defence was replaced with a three-five alignment.

In this particular alignment, one of the defensive linemen is substituted for by another linebacker. In the National Football League this type of defence has been experimented with by most teams. The Oakland Raiders used it extensively in their drive for the Super Bowl in 1977.

In the Toronto version of the three-five, the linemen become Dave Yarmoluk, Bill Levine and Ray Zarembo, while Tom Colangelo is sent in to join linebackers Julio Giordani, Robin Rushton and Mike Rossetti.

The three-five has been used successfully by Toronto in past seasons. This season the need to introduce this alignment became obvious after a supposedly weak Guelph team ripped Toronto for 190 yards through the air.

According to coach Ron Murphy, the insertion of the three-five was only natural for the York encounter because the Yeomen are a passing team. In the back of everyone's mind, however, is the importance a revamped pass defence could have on the outcome of the Western game next week.

Western is the best passing team in the conference, leading the second place club by over 400 yards. Quarterback Jamie Bone leads this attack and has completed 65 percent of the passes he has attempted.

Bone can expect to see a lot of the three-five next week.

If the three-five is as successful on second down situations as the coaches hope, then opposing teams will probably revert to passing on first down. This could cause a problem for the Blues.

In past games the Blues have shown that they are susceptible to the pass on first down. Against Guelph, the Gryphons continually threw on first down with success. On Saturday York had similar success throwing on first down.

Of York's 13 completions, eight came on first down situations. York's only points (two field goals) came after the Yeomen marched down field on the strength of first down completions.

It is natural to expect that a team will be looking for the run on first down and will therefore be more vulnerable to the pass. This, however, accounts for only part of the Toronto problem.

The Blues' alternate defensive tackles throughout the game depending on whether a pass or run is expected. For a run, Angelo Costalen and Eric Boss are sent in. When a pass is expected, they are replaced.

Seeing that the Blues defend against the pass better when certain personnel are in the lineup, the opposition naturally tries to pass when the Blues do not have their pass defence in the game. This means that a lot of passes are thrown on first down.

While admitting that the vulnerability to first down passes could be a problem, the coaches are not overly concerned with this matter. As assistant coach Rick Kollins says, "It is a compliment that teams throw so much on first down against us. It means they are admitting that they can't beat us any other way and they are giving up on their running game. A team can't win playing this way."

Murphy admits that a better pass rush could alleviate some of the first down problems and that it will probably be worked on in practise this week. Kollins points out that no pass rush can be effective unless the secondary provides good coverage. In other words, it will take a team effort to resolve any problems which may exist in the defence.

Kotsopoulos goes high to make a good catch.

Swimmers Raise $

As is the case with all areas of the athletic department the swim team is feeling the pinch from budget restrictions. Unlike other departments, however, which accept the cutbacks and either die out or cut back their programs, the swim team is looking to maintain their program by raising funds from outside organizations.

The swim team is motivated to seek outside funding because of the high quality of their program. Two of their swimmers, Dan Thompson and Rick Madge participated in the World Student Games in Bulgaria last August. Thompson won silver medals in the 100 metre butterfly and the 400 metre medley. His time in the butterfly was the tenth best in the world in 1977.

Despite receiving assistance from the university and the government, the team is still short $5,500.00 it will need to travel to the Winter Nationals being held in Vancouver in December.

The swim team is attempting to raise this money by canvassing swimming alumni and applying for a Winterio grant. It is projected that if every member of the 200 swimming alumni contributed $20.00 the rest of the money could come from Winterio.

U of T's future lies in excellence

By KATHY CANTY

Details of where the money will go at U of T next year were finally made public yesterday after weeks of closed door sessions by the Planning and Priorities Subcommittee of the Governing Council. The Subcommittee's

"Interim Report" detailed not only budget allocations and recommendations, but also suggested long range decision-making processes that will profoundly affect the future of the university.

The 29 suggestions include the recommendation that the university continue to seek a provincial funding system reflecting the special features of U of T and the quality of its graduate programs. (Presently, funding is based on enrolment. The university is allotted money on a per capita basis, a method which puts U of T with its high standards of excellence at a disadvantage according to the report.)

Consequently, the subcommittee places considerable emphasis upon excellence in its recommendations. It supports, for example, the use of external reviews of the academic programs at U of T and is even "prepared to accept the consequences of adverse comments." It recommends that "program excellence" be reinforced and designated as one of the chief criteria for the allocation of funds. In conjunction with this principle, the report advocates that the Office of the Vice-Provost produce a proposal for the "systematic and cyclical examination" of program quality at U of T.

Among the budget tactics in the report, the subcommittee suggests that the university maximize present sources of income, and seek new sources as well. Four alternatives to simple "across-the-board" cutbacks are suggested: in addition to seeking ways to increase income, the Budget Committee can selectively reduce expenditure in programs, "compress" or excise certain programs, and reduce the rate of salary raises.

In the subcommittee's set of criteria for overall planning and priority decisions, the report also proposes, in addition to the strengthening of academic excellence, the "unique synthesis" of the U of T environment, high priority placed on the needs of academic leadership, response to "society's needs" and responsibilities and the increased flexibility of staff employment (as it relates to tenure and "retraining"). In addition to these university-wide proposals the Planning and Priorities Subcommittee has outlined plans regarding the various faculties and divisions within the university.

The report advocates, for example, that no further resources be allocated to the Faculty of Social Work until improvements are made in both its teaching and research activity. In addition it suggests that the Faculty of Pharmacy consider increasing its undergraduate enrolment, and that the Faculty of Dentistry examine the possibility of turning its graduate diploma program into a master's program.

After the subcommittee meeting,

Student Governor Phil Ryan said that the assumptions behind the Interim Report "show that there is a division of what students think a university is and what planners think it is." He pointed out that the document does not deal with such concerns as adequate provision of tutorials or class sizes. Nor does it look into the question of the tenure system at U of T, he noted. In a time of cutbacks "certain sectors are protected." Noting the large proportion of professors on the Planning and Priorities Committee, he added that professors are one of these sectors.

Forestry turnabout

By KEN WHITEHURST

"We made a proposal and we rammed everything through," exclaimed happy Forestry Students' Administrative Council (SAC) representative Dave Brand after a meeting held yesterday afternoon in which students and Forestry professors voted to do away with Forestry's new course weighting system.

Professor Bob Fessenden, chairman of Forestry's curriculum committee, told the 80 students assembled. "We honestly did not expect the uprising of '77. We have called this meeting not to put out brush fires, but to deal with the philosophy of the new program."

Fessenden outlined how the decision to implement the new program had been made. He sought to assure them that the decision-making process had not purposely excluded Forestry students.

The alternatives to the new system that were considered by the various parts of the Faculty of Forestry were presented to the group and a discussion of those alternatives followed.

Fessenden, who was chairing the meeting, said, "If no one objects I will organize the discussion in a way that should appeal to Foresters and Botanists. We will use the dichotomous key approach." This announcement earned him laughs of approval.

The discussion proceeded with groups of students and professors arguing for a replacement to the new course weighting system. A few professors offered some arguments in favor of course weighting, but there was no hostility in the discussions.

The meeting approved proposals that will go to the faculty's curriculum committee. Those proposals include: core courses required for a Forestry degree to have equal weights; weights for elective courses to be similar to those in the Faculty of Arts and Sciences.

Brand said, "They (the Faculty of Forestry) made a mistake, but now they realize it. The meeting solved the problem except that those graduating this year have already chosen their courses and are stuck."

Forestry students show course weighting must go.

Lewis opposes differential fees, Foreign students singled out

By ROBERTA CLARE

One of Canada's contributions to the Third World has been endangered by the enforcement of the differential fee, according to Stephen Lewis, provincial leader of the NDP party, at a press conference held at Sutton Place Hotel Monday.

The conference, attended by the leaders of the opposition parties, was called by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) to outline the renewed efforts to abolish the differential fee regulation set by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities last year.

Stuart Smith, leader of the opposition party, was "disturbed by the atmosphere of racism" in several Ontario universities. The differential fee, he claimed, only increases the feeling among foreign students that they are being singled out.

"It is not foreign students but ourselves who are the beneficiaries" of a multi-cultural campus, Smith maintained. "Canada is becoming so preoccupied with our economic problems that we forget our perspective."

Alan Earp, Vice-President of the Canadian Bureau for International Education (CBIE) and President of Brock University, expressed concern that no research, study or discussion had been undertaken previous to the decision to enforce the differential fee. "Canada and Ontario spend a reprehensible amount of money making friends," he stated. The same amount, he claimed, can be saved by restricting university entrance. Such limitations "would not have a negative effect on those who come here," Earp stated.

Earp announced the release by the Bureau of a major study on foreign students. The document will prove that allegations against visa students that under such regulations are unprecedented, he claimed.

John Sweeney, provincial MPP of the Kitchener-Wilmot riding and Liberal critic, charged the government with failing to "stop the racist sentiment of our public." It is the responsibility of the government to correct public misconceptions, Sweeney claimed. "Foreign students are not taking the place of Ontario students. Only four to five per cent of Ontario students are foreigners," he explained. Sweeney pointed out that less than one per cent of medical students are visa students.

"The regulation was developed in a vacuum," Sweeney claimed.

The regulation is currently before the legal council of the Human Rights Commission to determine whether the code has been violated. Bromley Armstrong, Human Rights Commissioner, charged that the differential fee was a "violation of the spirit of the code."

The problem, Lewis stated, is that there is no individual law to rescind. Such regulations concerning tuition fees are set by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, he explained. Lewis suggested that rather than examine a general law, the OFS should bring a specific case of a foreign student before the Human Rights Commission. If there is a violation of the Code, the government "will be forced under embarrassment" to repeal the regulation.

Teaching careers still available

By JOHN THOMAS MACE

The newly revised Faculty of Education of the University of Toronto (FEUT) program, which will soon go before the legislature, was outlined to the approximately 80 students participating at the teaching "Careertalk" held at the Banting Institute on Monday.

The seminar, sponsored by U of T's Career Counselling and Placement Centre, featured FEUT Admissions Officer Gerald Whyte, Scarborough high school teacher John Lord and an unemployed FEUT graduate, David Brown. The speakers dealt with FEUT requirements, employment possibilities, and the generalities of teaching and learning to teach.

Whyte, however, first unveiled the new program. He said it will still be one year long, contrary to the rumor that it would be two, but now the "Type A" specialist teaching certificate can only be obtained after two years of teaching experience. The Bachelor of Education one year program will offer just the "Type B" certificate; teachers must return during the future to upgrade qualifications.

The speakers also explained the teaching divisions of the FEUT program to students. They would pick one area of study, but after two years at Summer School could be qualified in all areas. Students were also told that admission requirements to the faculty were based primarily on academic average, job and extracurricular experience and the marketability of the candidate's degree. Whyte, however, mentioned that the faculty tries to accommodate as many students as possible — last year out of 6,500 applications, 3,000 were offered places, but only about half registered.

Whyte said employment opportunities are worse than commonly thought. The faculty will face difficulties in placing teachers over the next five years, Whyte explained, because of the small number of students in high schools. Nonetheless, Brown said that if the pupil-teacher ratio was lowered by one, a shortage of teachers would result.

Prospective teachers were told that about one third of last year's graduates were placed, mostly outside Toronto. Two or three dozen found jobs in Alberta, one or two dozen in the North West Territories, and three or four in British Columbia. It was revealed that the Maritimes did not hire any FEUT graduates last year, but some found work on Indian Reserves in Ontario. One student asked about job markets in the U.S. and all three speakers agreed that the situation was worse there than here. Lord added that he read of a high school position in Vermont whose starting salary was $7,000 maximum per year.

Accounting, marketing, industrial arts and music could land students a job most easily, the speakers said. Lower down on the scale are Math and Physics, with the Social Sciences near the bottom.

Lord stated that fewer teachers are leaving the profession and that more and more women are taking maternity leave rather than resigning. He attributed this to the change in the economic climate. But he said that enrolment will "bottom out" in high schools around 1981, and estimated that some new positions will open up again. Lord also mentioned that the teachers' strike of two years ago was caused by long-term disenchantment with the system and the continuing conflict between elected trustees and the teachers.

Fugitive denounces South African "justice"

By PETER HOHENADEL

"This is not an easy matter for me to speak of, because it is an experience that is burned into my brain and soul," said Mac Maharaj, of his twelve year incarceration at Robben Island, South Africa's penal colony for political prisoners. Maharaj finished his term in December 1976 and was placed under house arrest before being smuggled out of South Africa in July of this year, with the help of the African National Congress (ANC).

Maharaj is now devoted to the promotion of a new order in South Africa under the direction of the ANC. "The solution to our problem is not counter-racism, but the formation of a society that treats all human beings equally," he said of ANC's ambitions. Maharaj was speaking to about 100 people at the First Unitarian Church on Monday night.

Maharaj spoke of Steve Biko's highly publicized death, the twenty-fifth in South African jails since March 1976. He discredited the official statement that Biko died after a week's hunger strike. Most of these twenty-five deaths have been falsely classed as accidents or suicides, according to Maharaj.

The need for vigorous protest against a government that is "prepared to resist with nuclear weapons" was emphasized by Maharaj. "You may think that your protests have no meaning in South Africa, but their effect is real," he said. Maharaj recalled that during his own trial in 1963, a formal protest from the United Nations averted a death sentence for himself and his co-defendants.

In 1974, South African Minister of Justice James Kruger told the UN, "Give us six months to get our house in order." According to Maharaj, the struggle is only beginning. The South African apartheid system is falling down around them. The South African government is using the ANC "as a scapegoat for social unrest," said Maharaj. Known ANC members are given the stiffest sentences and harassed more vigorously than non-members, he stated.

Nonetheless, the ANC is growing steadily. Since 1962, they have been sending trained guerrillas into South Africa Maharaj said. They maintain expatriate ranks in Botswana and Swaziland, who aid in the underground resistance in South Africa. Around the world, young black South Africans are studying at universities under the auspices of the ANC.

Jean McGuire, a representative of Canadians Concerned about South Africa (CCSA) told the enthusiastic audience that the Canadian government "refuses to carry through its condemnation of apartheid to concrete action." She stated that even though Canada originally proposed the motion to expel South Africa from the Commonwealth, they still offer preferential trade agreements to that country, as if they were still a member of the Commonwealth. She called on the people of Ontario to press for the exclusion of South African liquor on LCBO shelves, a concrete political decision that has already been implemented by Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Prison Terror

By PETER HOHENADEL

Robben Island lies off the southern tip of the African continent in Table Bay, just five miles from Capetown. Originally used as a refuge and seal hunting ground for Dutch sailors, Robben Island has been maintained as a home for lepers, lunatics, law-breakers, the chronic sick and paupers since the seventeenth century.

In 1959, the South African government announced the reconversion of Robben Island to a prison. Since that time, Robben Island has been used exclusively as a prison for male political prisoners convicted in South African courts.

Mac Maharaj spent 12 years on Robben Island for his part in social protest against the apartheid system. Maharaj's account of the conditions in the prison "shows us the bone structure of this race-mad society."

At the prison, guards give preferred treatment to "foreign coloreds and Asians" over native Africans. Maharaj stated that Africans were more likely to be beaten, and found themselves quartered in solitary confinement. "They cannot conceive of a black man as a human being," Maharaj said.

"The prison is run under a rule of open and naked terror," according to Maharaj. "Daily beatings were not carried out by whim," Maharaj said; "they were sanctioned by the topmost offer of prison and government."

Conditions changed considerably at Robben Island after 1971, Maharaj said. Mass beatings were no longer conducted regularly at the prison. Maharaj speculated that the effect of strong political action in the form of hunger strikes, refusal of work duties, and appeals to South African and international authorities, helped pressure the government into abolishing systematic physical brutality.

"More subtle forms of pressure are still being used," Maharaj said. "They want to break us as human beings." Nonetheless, he looks back on his experience "without regret." "I treasure these experiences because we have taken the worst the government could inflict and survived."

Prof tells U of T story

By GILLIAN O'REILLY

The turbulent progress of the University of Toronto through the nineteenth century was the topic of a lecture given by Professor G. Craig at University College last Thursday. It was the first of two on the university's history in the Sesquicentennial series of lectures.

The university began as King's College in 1827 with John Strachan, bishop of Toronto, as president, Craig related to about 50 spectators. After many years of contention over the funding of a denominational college by provincial taxes, the University of Toronto was established in 1850. It was a non-denominational, degree-granting institution, described by Strachan as "the godless institution." Teaching of arts subjects was done by the new University College.

However, many felt that the religiously affiliated colleges were necessary for the educational and moral life of the province, Craig told the audience. In 1887, a unique compromise was achieved. The colleges would affiliate with the university but would keep their identities as arts and religious colleges. U of T would grant all the degrees and would teach some subjects itself. The university thus offered both the atmosphere of college life and the facilities for teaching the newly developing sciences.

There was a prolonged battle over the site of the university itself, Craig revealed. Although the founders had bought 170 acres bounded by Bloor, Yonge, College and St. George Streets, construction was delayed for many years. In 1885 permission and funds were granted to construct a new building and library.

Frederick Cumberland, the architect, had the advice of the Governor-General of Upper Canada, Sir Edmund Head and John Langton, the Vice-Chancellor. After much controversy over whether to use Italian, Byzantine or Gothic style, a plan emerged for the present design of University College which Langton termed the "Canadian style."

In the 1870's U of T was forced to expand its science program in order to compete with other universities in the race for scientific discoveries at the time. Laboratories were introduced for the first time; before then students learned everything from blackboard diagrams.

Pressure for change also came from women in the 1870's, Craig said. In 1884, new laws forced the admission of women to classes. Daniel Wilson, president of UC, wanted women to have a separate college as at Oxford and Cambridge in England. However, there were no funds available for such a policy and the women had to be admitted into the men's colleges.

Interim Planning and Priorities Report.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

Such violence

The question that comes to mind upon watching a Western reporter in West Germany piously wonder about the motives of young men and women who turn to violence is why the terrorists have so far left American reporters unmolested. The inanity that passes for news is perhaps one of the better illustrations of what makes people dismiss dialogue as a fraud and resort to violence.

The question itself — why would anyone in a liberal democratic state resort to violence — betrays the ideological stance of the ones who pose it. It is a question that only has meaning if one has already assumed that violence against the liberal state cannot have a rational basis. Revolutionary violence is only incomprehensible if it is deemed impossible that the ones against whom violence is directed could be guilty of violence. In effect to pose the question at all, is to declare yourself ignorant of the everyday violence of the liberal state and the exploitative system upon which it rests. Were this violence to be admitted the motives behind revolutionary violence would become transparent. It would then be totally superfluous to ask why young men and women turn to violence.

To observe at first hand the sort of subtle everyday violence that makes people put their faith in guns one need only take a look at the current degeneration of language. Most of what one reads or hears today, from Eaton's commercials to political declarations, is purposefully vacuous. To indulge in metaphysical stupidity, to string words together for no other reason than that they make statements which mimic profundity is nowadays considered a mark of high intellect. The degeneration has gone so far that it has become difficult to determine whether it is the advertising idiom which has corrupted language or whether telegraphese is a symptom of a decaying language.

That this is no harmless accident becomes apparent if we recognize that language, quite apart from being an indicator of thought, is a necessary component of it. George Orwell intuitively understood this when he wrote 1984. So did Aldous Huxley in Brave New World. In both utopias the structure of the language prevents all but the proper thoughts. In Orwell's book the technique for ensuring this is actually described in the appendix on Newspeak, the official language.

The structure of current language does not so much restrict certain thoughts as it trivializes all thought. The effect of this is to transform criticism into a mere expression of impulse. One observes this regularly in newsreporting. People are described as "articulate" for example without any reference being made to what they are articulate about. From this standpoint

Marxists, liberals, conservatives all merge into each other — they are all "idealist", "hard-hitting", "determined", etc. The fundamental differences are consistently glossed over. Violence, to give a topical example, is viewed as an essentially homogenous phenomenon: whether a policeman is killed by a bank-robber or a revolutionary we are encouraged to view the event as an "act of violence". Motives are not salient. When the media inquires about them it does so in a purely rhetorical fashion: it is not so much interested in determining motives as it is in making the point that there can be no rational motive for attacking the state.

Given that language has been deprived of its critical faculty other methods of criticism can be expected to predominate. Of these violence is the most attractive.

Violence has two distinct advantages over language: it is direct and leaves no room for misinterpretation. Whereas literary rebellion allows itself to be absorbed into orthodoxy violence has an instantaneous effect whose significance is ineradicable. Above all violence cannot be dismissed away particularly when it consciously challenges the established authority. A response, a violent one, has to be made, whereas other forms of criticism can be allowed to dissipate themselves away. Revolutionary violence forces the state to acknowledge the existence of a counter-power, a victory from the revolutionary standpoint, because the state itself draws attention to an alternative. So much for an explanation of the current popularity of terrorism. The morality of it is more ambiguous.

Insofar as capitalism is an inherently violent system, one which systematically reduces human life to the level of commodities, a system that converts people into things, violence against capitalism and its agents is justified. To resist being converted into a commodity, within a society that deals exclusively with commodities, is to live your life as violent negation of all that exists around you. Violence from this standpoint is simply the objectification of a condition one lives daily. Morally it is not a difficult decision to make.

Where the problem arises is in the setting of limits, a problem posed in more dramatic terms in hostage-taking incidents such as the one that has just ended in Somalia. The problem there is how far one can treat others as means.

The final goal of the revolutionary is to construct a society in which people treat each other as ends. The paradox is that the construction of such a society from what already exists necessarily involves using other people. Revolutionaries desire freedom but must exercise discipline if they are to bring their project to a successful conclusion. They want to make life worth living but find vast majority of them. (I refer to the early September ads in The Varsity advertising the position of Film Services Co-ordinator.) I should mention that an excuse was offered: lack of manpower to deal individually with the applicants. I would suggest a politely phrased form letter acknowledging receipt of the application, advising that a preliminary selection has been made, interviews are being conducted and if these don't pan out the applicant will be contacted. Yours, etc.

This would allow those applicants who feel they have something more to say the opportunity to reapply. Instead, the GSA is currently sending out letters (I haven't received mine yet) turning everyone down. The manpower required to send out either one or another form letter is the same; in the latter case, of course, some wit is required.

If the GSA merely has found a replacement in line with their current lack of imagination, taking this bit of trouble might have netted them someone who might have done something about the schlock programming at OISE, which is duplicated all over town, and provided a real service to students and, of course, profits for GSA coffers — which to date seems to be the only reason for their film series.

Surviving

Some years ago the news of resource depletion, environmental damage and the exploitation of one people by another caused me to suspect that there must be a more appropriate goal for society than just expanding the GNP. After a lengthy study of problems and solutions as presented by concerned people, a basic set of guidelines became evident. The objectives are:

- To develop an ecologically sound way of supporting human life. That is, one in which materials are managed in continuing cycles and the energy necessary to advance those cycles is taken from continuously reliable sources.
- To encourage life-based pursuits. These would include: interpersonal relations, creativity, co-ordination, appreciation and spiritual, intellectual and psychic development.
- To develop toward technologies which do not: 1) Require a continual input of non-renewable resources. 2) Have a cumulatively degrading effect on the environment. 3) Require more material than would be available if the world's resources were equitably distributed amongst the world's people.

There are many people that believe that it is essential to develop along these lines if we are to survive. We would like your readers to ask themselves if they agree. Through common agreement it is possible to make this option visible as an issue to be addressed by those who direct our society's development.

For convenience in identifying this option it has been labeled Bakavi (ba-ka-vee). The bakavi has been selected from the history of one of North America's native people; it refers to a vehicle used to survive problems brought about by people so caught up in their own creations that they acted without regard for the non-human creation which makes life possible.

Mike Nickerson

Call a meeting over economy Davis asks PM

that achieving this will involve taking the life of their enemies. And their enemies are not only those who consciously oppose them but also those whose actions inadvertently help the enemy. If you are not for the revolution you are against it.

The paradox is not easy to resolve. One thing is clear however: the most vociferous denouncers of terrorism are likely to be the worst hypocrites.

The main argument against adventurist violence however is not directly moral. The fact is that hijacking planes and kidnapping one or two capitalists doesn't bring revolution any closer but may actually retard it. Violence can be tempting but for that very reason has to be suspect. Patient organizing and persistent propaganda though not as satisfying are ultimately more effective. The time may come when violence will have to be resorted to but when that time comes the fighting will be done from a position of strength. Smashing one's head against the wall is an act of desperation. It warrants understanding followed by condemnation.

Unity Canada

Last weekend the Unity Canada debate rolled into Toronto in the form of the Options conference - a conference on the Future of the Canadian Confederation. Its aim was to analyze the current political crisis and use this new perception as a foundation for solutions. The conference was a major disappointment. The intellectual and political heavies trotted out and presented the same old arguments, both pro and con in new clothing. The most interesting and thoughtful considerations were given to a discussion of the possible impact separation would have on our social, economic and military position both in the domestic and international fields. Too bad such vigour was not displayed in proposing ways of solving the present crisis. English Canadians simply refuse to accept the notion of a crisis situation and will only be shaken out of a sense of their complacency when separation is a fait accompli.

OISE callous

I think it only good manners that a prospective employer, advertising in The Varsity, or anywhere else for that matter, answer letters he is soliciting.

The Graduate Students Association (OISE) is in need of some correction in this area and I should like to take this opportunity to deliver a sharp rap on their knuckles for their callousness. I thought perhaps it was mere ignorance or carelessness, in which case I would have been satisfied by a perfunctory apology and assurance of renewed vigilance in their human relations, but a recent telephone conversation put me straight on that point. They were being perfectly fair in not answering my letter requesting an interview because, well, they hadn't answered the

Young Socialists support OFS program

On September 21, Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities, Harry Parrott, announced the "principles" of a new student aid program to take effect next year.

While Parrott has not disclosed how much money parents will be expected to contribute to their children's education, if the proposals made by the Interim Committee on Financial Assistance to Students is any indication, it will be substantially higher than previously.

This latest attack on the right to an education is another step toward implementing the recommendations of the McKeough-Henderson report, released in 1975. This report proposed how the government could react to the current economic crisis — by cutting back on much-needed social services, such as education. The report recommended a $155 million cut over two years in post-secondary education spending.

The new student aid program, which follows the general $100 fee increase and the differential fee increase for international students, is another step toward the government's goal of shifting more and more of the cost of post-secondary education onto the individual student.

Education is a right.

The OFS is on record as favoring the abolition of tuition and the provision of a living stipend for students as a step toward universal accessibility. In order to achieve this objective and to mount an effective opposition to Parrott's plan, we must fight for the 10-point program of the OFS.

The OFS program includes the following basic demands:

1. A student should be considered independent at age 18. The arbitrary parental contribution table should be eliminated.
2. The living allowance must reflect the actual living costs in the community in which the student lives.
3. The grant portion of awards must become progressively greater until the loan portion is eliminated entirely.
4. The freeze on tuition fee increases for 1978-79 must be extended indefinitely.

How can students win these demands?

We shouldn't let the fact that the government hasn't released all the details of the new student aid plan stop us from organizing against it now. To do this would be playing into the government's hands.

Parrott is obviously withholding full details of the new plan in the hope that this will undercut any immediate response from students. By the time he releases the remaining information he expects most students will have become reconciled to his proposals as a whole.

It is already clear that Parrott's proposals go in the opposite direction to the demands put forward by the OFS. If we are serious about winning universal accessibility we must begin to fight for it now.

In 1976 the OFS called a demonstration against the regressive policies of the McKeough-Henderson report. Three thousand students marched in this successful protest, saying "no!" to the report's recommendations.

This action was in marked contrast to the limited success of the November 9 National Student Day and the February 10 Moratorium called to protest the $100 fee increase. These fragmented, isolated protests failed to generate the movement required to turn back the continuing attacks on the right to an education because they failed to tap our power — our numbers organized in massive visible actions.

The February 1976 Ontario Student, reporting on the January 21 demonstration, described the strategy that is needed. "The momentum is there, the movement is growing, if the readers of this paper want it, insist on it, we can bring these out of the backrooms and caucuses and into the popular arena where they belong. On that point there seems to be a unanimity developing: What is necessary now is to translate that unanimity into practical action by bringing to bear our weight against the government when it next sets out to attack us..."

This was never more true than now! It will take that type of public protest action to unite tens of thousands of students across this province against the government.

These actions must aim to win other sectors of society who are adversely affected by the social service cutbacks to our side.

However, it isn't enough to call a one-shot affair like January 21 that serves only to back up a strategy of lobbying. These public actions must be organized continually with the aim of winning over ever-greater numbers to fight for the right to an education.

Student victim of brutal attack

By KEN WHITEHURST

"You fucking nigger!" shouted one of the two youths who attacked me on the platform of the Bloor subway at two o'clock yesterday afternoon.

While the two punched me, kicked me and spread my belongings around the platform, a hundred waiting subway passengers gave the hoodlums the room they needed to kick me around and then tried to pretend nothing was happening.

I had never seen the two youths before, and I have no idea about why I was attacked — I am not even black.

Being assaulted as I was is enlightening. It made me appreciate that there are sick people roaming the streets, and that my fellows are too timid or unconcerned to care if I am being beaten before their eyes. Also, you come to understand in physical terms what being called a nigger means.

Hanging on to one of my assailants legs I yelled at the crowd, "That's right just stand around and watch — stand around and watch the show."

After I had repeated my cry time and again, an elderly woman pointed her finger accusingly at the two and shouted, "I'm going to call the police on you two."

My attackers fled. It only took the bravery of one old woman to scare them off, and yet young men standing on the platform chose not to get involved.

Tuesday morning I heard a Metro politician speaking on the radio who was decrying vigilantism. He said that people were losing confidence in the police forces' ability to protect them and would resort to taking the law into their own hands. Certainly, lynch mob law is not something that anyone wants, but I think vigilantism may not be such a bad idea.

Calling the police, something I did not bother to do, would not make the throbbing pain in my left elbow stop. Other people have been more brutally attacked than I, and calling the police after the attacks were over helped to bring the attackers to justice, but it did not prevent the people who were attacked from being injured. Only those who witness an assault can prevent the injury and humiliation that comes from being brutalized.

I did not call the police, because I do not have a clear picture of what they looked like (things happened too fast), and because I saw all my witnesses disappear on the next train.

I must dwell for a moment on the fact that I was saved from more physical harm by that elderly lady. One could dismiss as coincidence that it was she who came to my assistance and not someone else, but for the fact that it was two elderly men who came to give me solace after my attackers left.

These elderly people gave me as much help as their age would reasonably allow, but people who were much younger did not help me ostensibly because I am not their responsibility. All I can say is that I am glad that small group of elderly people saw me as their responsibility.

The summer job solution. . .

"Effort, initiative and persistence"

By Ann Clarkson

Students are facing one of the grimmest summers ever for summer employment, with 94 thousand new students seeking jobs and the market expected to become even tighter with secondary school students soon to join the unemployment ranks.

— Globe & Mail, June 21, 1977.

Every summer the prophecy remains the same: the summer unemployment plague will infect and lacerate one fifth of the student body. But is it really that bad?

As everyone knows the summer employment picture is definitely not good. And although the promised Statistics Canada wrap-up on student summer employment has not been issued, pre-released statistics show that the unemployment rate of returning students in Ontario reached a high of 14.7 percent in June. At a participation rate of 53.8 percent, 51,000 of the approximately 200,000 post-secondary students were jobless.

In a National Union of Students press release, it was reported that jobs were so scarce in Windsor that the City Hall held a lottery to deal with the crush of job-seekers. More than 1,200 students entered the first lottery for 40 jobs.

The Summer and Part-time Employment Co-ordinator of the University of Toronto Career Counselling and Placement Centre (CCPC), Evelyn Paley, maintains that "it is definitely getting harder to find a summer job." However she feels that, owing to the doom forecast by the media, students often settle for jobs below what they had hoped for and probably would have obtained.

In the CCPC survey for the summer of 1976, 67 percent of the 619 respondents commenced their job search feeling apprehensive about their chances of success. While 66 percent felt it was more difficult to find a job in 1976 than 1975, 92 percent were successful in finding summer employment.

However, this high employment figure does not account for the student's availability for work, the actual duration of employment, the wage and overall job satisfaction. The fact that 33 percent held more than one job and/or did not work as long as they wanted to, further detracts from the accuracy of the 92 percent figure.

How then does a student go about finding a summer job?

According to the same CCPC survey, the most effective job search method was calling or applying personally to employers on one's own initiative. This method was used by 76 percent of the students, while the largest number, 26 percent, considered it the most effective.

While the personal contact method was the most effective, it was followed closely by "contacting former employers" (20 per cent effective), and "asking friends and relatives" to help (18 percent effective).

As noted in the CCPC survey, the successful use of this last method was interesting in terms of the 1976 Carleton Student Employment Survey, which found a strong correlation between family income and student unemployment. Students from lower income families faced a much higher unemployment rate than did students from more affluent families (16.9 percent vs. 7.1 percent).

It is also significant that while 64 percent of students in the CCPC survey applied to Canada Manpower, only 14 percent found this method successful.

The U of T Placement Centre is a first stop for many.

The 1977 Manpower statistics are contrary to this evaluation. In Ontario, placements increased by 21.2 percent. Out of 230,000 applications, 85,000 placements were anticipated while 101,000 placements were actually filled.

But the accuracy of this high placement rate in representing long-term employment is questionable. It neither accounts for the length of each job — casual jobs lasting five days or less, and 'regular' jobs lasting five days or more — or the fact that one person could have filled any number of 'placements'.

Such 'statistics' underline the Ontario Federation of Students' complaint that "in dealing with the public and the press, we must point out the fact that the official stats are bogus."

Yet despite this criticism, each summer Manpower does create a number of OFS approved social service programs which fill the employment needs of some students.

Its primary program, the Student Summer Employment and Activities Program (SSEAP), is composed of 18 component projects operated by different Federal departments. Last summer, SSEAP provided 9,648 jobs across Canada ranging through such ministries as Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Fishery and Environment, and Health and Welfare.

One of these programmes involved job counselling and public relations work in Canada Manpower Centres. This programme supplied roughly 320 jobs across Ontario, all of which lasted about three months and paid $4.50 per hour.

Although SSEAP will continue next year, the 1977 Young Canada Works (YCW) and Summer Job Corps (SJC) programmes, which were run under its authority, may be terminated or replaced by counterpart projects. According to Manpower officials it "all depends if the Federal government is willing to spend the money."

Programmes are not officially announced until January or February, yet early registration along with continual rechecking is urged, since competition is "incredibly high."

Young Canada Works absorbed almost one-half of SSEAP's total 1977 budget of $65,900,000, and provided over 6,000 jobs in Ontario and 34,500 across Canada. The program granted social service projects a maximum of $2,500 for work in day camps, youth and community centres. While some projects lasted four months, many may have lasted only two months with minimal wages of approximately $100 per week.

The same low wages were applied to SJC, which absorbed $10 million of SSEAP's budget to provide 100 to 130 jobs in Toronto and 1,016 jobs across Ontario. However, all jobs in SJC lasted three to four months. In one project, the Post Office hired students to promote the use of the postal code, while in another students questioned consumers on their attitude to the Department of Consumers and Corporate Affairs.

The major problem with some of SSEAP's component projects remains their limited duration and low pay.

As a result underemployment is created which obviously affects accessibility to higher education. A student may be officially employed in a program and yet only work a total of eight weeks at a miserable salary of $115 per week. The gross of $920 will barely cover tuition fees.

Moreover, since none of these students would have worked 12 weeks in the last 52, they would not be eligible for unemployment

"You have to start looking early"

By ANN CLARKSON

Evelyn Paley is the Summer and Part-time Co-ordinator of the Career Counselling and Placement Centre.

Varsity: Do you think there is a need for job-hunting training?
Paley: Definitely. Many students do not realize there is a need or they don't bother learning because they don't feel it is necessary.

A lot of students will come in and say I don't have any skills. Now that's just not true. Even the most menial waitressing job shows that you have had to deal with all types of people and have had to exercise some tolerance and patience.

People are thinking of technical skills, while personal skills are most important.

Varsity: When should students start looking for jobs in the Placement Centre?

Paley: Specialized jobs such as accounting and engineering start coming in the fall around October and November. More generalized jobs come in April, while May is the peak month.

However, I tell people to come in in October, and then every two or three weeks until February and then, after that, to come in weekly. There are a lot of general jobs that require an early deadline. If you want to be a customs officer or you want to be an interpreter with Parks Canada, you have to have your application in by mid-January. It doesn't take that much time to drop in early to find out about a lot of interesting jobs which you will miss out on later in the year.

Counsellor Evelyn Paley

Varsity: Outside of the Placement Centre's services, how should a student approach looking for a summer job?

Paley: According to Manpower Studies, 80 per cent of employers do not list their jobs outside their company walls.

I don't subscribe to the idea of knocking on doors in person because you either do not get beyond the receptionist or just fill in an application. What I suggest is that you zoom in a little bit on the type of environment you would like to work in and then perhaps go through the yellow pages. Start off by being a bit selective, narrowing areas down.

Just phone and say "I'm interested in this sort of job — do you hire summer students? In what areas of the company? What is the procedure for hiring? When do you start the hiring?" You get immediate feedback by calling. If you just send a list of resumes to companies, you do not.

Big companies get people applying before Christmas. By April they have probably already hired or have 10,000 applications. It is just too late.

Phoning early does take time, but I would not envy anyone coming in here in May when the competition is very high. Especially when you can avoid all that with an organized approach and a little bit of work each week.

Varsity: What information should be contained in a resume?
Paley: What people have to do in a resume is point out what they particularly know about a company, why they are particularly interested in that company, how they feel they can contribute, and why their particular skills fit in with the job the company has to offer.

An employer does not want a student to tell about his life story unless it is related to their needs and what he or she has to offer. It should link their qualities with the company as opposed to just saying "Well, here I am."

A company is egotistical enough: they want to think you know something about them. You have to be aware of its products and services and perhaps its growth rate. You should be able to ask intelligent questions. When you are competing with several hundred people you've just got to make yourself stand out in some way.

It all comes down to the fact that job hunting is a skill and skills have got to be learned.

Varsity: What services are offered by the Placement Centre?

Paley: If anyone is wanting some individual help planning a job search strategy, someone to criticize their resume or offer constructive suggestions, or if they just want some sort of direction there are four counsellors as well as myself who would be willing to talk to someone on an individual basis.

We now have audio visual equipment and some very good tapes on job search techniques, the interview and the resume. As well we are starting summer job information seminars on October 24 to give students an idea of how we work and the facilities we have.

If you register with us there is a semi-referral service. If you possess skills like typing, bookkeeping or facility in another language; or if you want to do life guarding, swim instruction, gardening, painting or child care, we send out copies of the jobs we get from October to the end of March to the people on the list. But it is strictly a supplementary service.

When people register they are under the impression they will always be notified. However, owing to the large number of people we are dealing with it is impossible to refer people to everything. One office job may be applicable to 300 people, so they should come in regularly and check themselves. Also, jobs should be called for immediately.

Some people take the information home, and decide to call the next day when the job is often taken.

Varsity: How do you view the summer employment situation now?

Paley: We did make more placements this summer than last. I think because the permanent situation is tightening up: that in fact people are hiring more full-in staff; temporary summer help, part-time jobs.

I still don't feel that students realize the effort they have to put into it now, and the skills that are required, and the fact that you have to start early. I don't think applying to 20 companies is an effort.

I would advise anyone to get as many practical skills as possible.

As far as I am concerned learning to type is as important as getting your driver's licence. Employers prefer you to type in most jobs, although people turn their nose down at it.

Another thing a student can do is pick up a few hours in a part-time job — they will make some contacts which might lead to a summer job.

The thing to remember is that it takes effort, initiative and persistence, and just don't sit back and wait for something to happen.

tence"

insurance benefits during the next summer.

Although the Carleton survey showed students worked an average period of 14 weeks, the 1976 Student Summer Employment Survey from the University of Western Ontario showed that 65 percent of students worked less than 12 weeks (55 percent of males and 75 percent of females).

This problem surfaced in the CCPC survey too, in which 24 percent applied for UIC and 41 percent applied for a student loan, suggesting that "the student did not work the entire summer or if they did work the money earned was not sufficient to carry them through the school year."

The question of underemployment is one of the major concerns of OFS, particularly since those students from low income backgrounds who are "most dependent on a summer job to return to school are the very ones least likely to get a job."

As a result OFS continues to pressure the government for adequate income support for students during the summer months, and recommends the elimination of the summer savings requirement of OSAP.

The OFS is also concerned with the short duration of social service projects, which seriously hampers the realization of their stated objectives.

A possible solution forwarded by OFS researcher Dale Martin is "an employment programme that would integrate students into existing projects (by increasing funding during the summer work term) and allow students and non-students to initiate programmes that would continue beyond the end of the summer employment period. These programmes would be open-ended inasmuch as funding would continue as long as the community saw the project as viable."

The policy of announcing such job programmes late in the school year is also criticized. SAC External Commissioner John Doherty feels that "Job creation programmes should be announced early, owing to the unemployment situation and also to allow student input into the decision-making process."

For example, the fate of this year's Provincial government "Experience" program, which has been operating since 1974, has not yet been decided. If it does continue, as is hoped, program applications will not be released to the public until February or March.

According to Cindy Greeniaus, information co-ordinator of the Ontario Youth Secretariat, which administers the "Experience" program, it is announced late because it is considered a secondary resort program designed for people unable to find a job.

Last summer with a budget of $15 million, Experience '77 provided 11,400 jobs involving 18 ministries and 63 component programmes. Jobs ranged from assistant curators in museums and legal aid to stage design and production work in theatres.

One program, Student Training in Personnel (SIP), created in affiliation with the Ministry of Labour, hired 80 senior university students for personnel-related jobs. Job responsibilities ranged through staff development and training to labour relations, communications and employee counselling.

Competition was high. Eighteen hundred applications were received for the sixteen week job at a salary of only $120 per week. Karen Smith, the programme supervisor, feels that SIP is of benefit to "the students in terms of training and development, and also serves to improve the communications channels between business and government." As well, she feels it may lead students to later employment opportunities in personnel areas.

The salaries in Experience Programs are low, extending from $2.65 to $3.75 per hour, but competition remains high. Applicants apply on average to 15 different programs, but the application ratio is approximately 30 to one for each job.

Criticism of the low wages is levelled at the Provincial government by John Doherty of SAC. He argues that "since the Provincial government sets a minimum requirement for money that should be saved by a returning student, they should be willing to pay it. At present the wage is not high enough to let a student save and meet the requirement."

As well, he criticizes the highly promoted Ontario Youth Employment Program. Developed by the Youth Secretariat in conjunction with the Ministry of Treasury, Economics, and Intergovernmental Affairs, it paid businesses and farms $1.00 per hour this summer towards the wages of summer employees engaged in a newly-created job. Doherty maintains that, "it is difficult to find out if jobs were created through this method or merely reshuffled. A more effective program would be in direct and controlled job creation."

In addition to these special programs, the Provincial government's regular student summer replacement within government ministries provided 10,000 jobs last summer. For employment opportunities, students are advised to personally contact the personnel director of each ministry. This initial step should be undertaken early in the new year, and applies to all high competition government jobs.

If at this point a student is still wondering how to look for a summer job, a free booklet can be obtained from the Ontario Youth Secretariat providing guidelines for applications, letters, resumes, and interviews.

Cindy Greeniaus of the Youth Secretariat states "I am amazed at the number of young people who don't know how to go about getting a summer job. They have never heard of the word resume or they go to job interviews with their friends." She stresses again the much reiterated point that "the most important part of an interview is the first few seconds within the door. The overall impression is very important; from appearance and just the way you say hello."

To return to the original question: is the summer unemployment situation really that bad? The statistics do appear pessimistic and against the constant background of media groans, at times impossibly gloomy.

In the CCPC survey, 61 percent agreed that, "Any student who really wanted a summer job could find one," but this statement was qualified: "... if the student was willing to work for low pay and could overcome the feeling of being exploited." Yes, the rivalry for good summer jobs is and will remain intense.

Clearly then, the unemployment plague has permeated the student body. On an individual basis it appears that initiative is now the only effective inoculation against it, while thought, organization, and constant effort have become exigencies in a successful search for that 'pot of gold' — a satisfying and well-paying summer job.

3 R's movement threatens schools

By ALAN STEWART

Teachers and administrators at two "alternative" secondary schools near the U of T Campus are optimistic about the long-term future of alternative education, but concerned about the short-term consequences of the educational "back-to-basics" movement.

Inglebrook school opened in September of 1974 in the basement of a former Baptist church at the corner of Yonge St. and MacPherson Avenue. The initial enrolment was 25 students, each paying a tuition fee of $1,250. Inglebrook refused to refer to itself as a "free" school, stating that it put the emphasis on responsibility. Students were to benefit from the informal atmosphere, much smaller class sizes, and the school's "Community Outreach" program which engaged in social improvement projects in the local community.

Three years later, the enrolment is up to 50 and the tuition fee is now $2,000. According to teacher-administrator David Hine, the high tuition may be keeping enrolment below the optimum figure, but it does not seriously endanger the school's long-term prospects. "There will always be people who are willing to pay for what we have to offer."

The school is now attempting to involve students more directly in educational and administrative decisions, but the process has met some obstacles. According to Hine, it is not easy to take students from the public school environment and expect them to adopt the weight of responsibility for running a school co-operatively with the administration: "You can't just create perfect student-teacher co-operation overnight." Students are represented on the committees which have jurisdiction over academic standards, classroom procedures, discipline, and the like.

According to Hine, a more serious obstacle is the attitude taken in the last "one or two years" by the Ministry of Education, which oversees the school's curriculum and must approve any experimental courses or methods.

"When we would go to them three years ago, they would at least try to cooperate with us, try to show us what we could do. Recently, they have adopted a much more supervisory approach," Hine would not comment on the Ministry's attitude.

This view of the current attitude within the Ministry of Education is shared by Achirn Krull, a teacher-administrator at the renowned Subway Academy operating out of 16 Pin St. Krull emphasizes that he has no sympathy for the techniques and methods usually associated with free education — open classrooms, open curricula, absence of competition, and emphasis on social adjustment. "You're asking the wrong person," Krull said. "My opinions in that area are somewhat to the right of Atilla the Hun."

Subway Academy works on the model of a university, allowing a certain amount of choice in courses and giving students wide latitude to research subjects in whatever way they choose. "We give them their assignments and send them away," summarized Krull. But he said extremely high academic standards are maintained, and the failure-withdrawal rate is high.

Krull also has noticed a "harder line on experimental courses" on the part of the Ministry of Education. He feels this is motivated by the back-to-basics movement, which he says is politically motivated. "It's a great bandwagon," Krull criticizes accusations of lowered academic standards at universities, attributing the appearance of lowered standards solely to the much larger number of students now attending university.

Krull does not feel that the current movement for higher academic standards will kill alternative schooling. "If repression is going to increase, our clientele is going to increase tremendously, for there are going to be more rebels than ever before." The violence in the school systems of U.S. cities such as Chicago and Detroit could be seen here, he said, if educational repression continues on the upswing. "Violence in the educational system is the reflection of a repressive system." According to Krull, we may see the effects of this movement soon: "I really don't know, but I would think we would probably see a return to repression in the next few years."

Larry Kent, executive assistant to Minister of Education Tom Wells, said that if there had been any change in the ways that alternative schools were treated, he was not aware of it. "I would find that a little difficult to believe," he said. "I would think that that would have filtered up to us by now." But "there has been more emphasis on the basics, on the basic type of education, and you can draw your own conclusions on what has to suffer."

Int'l Centre open to all

By ANDREW MAHON

Ten years ago, the International Student Centre (ISC) was created to encourage intercultural relations between students, but today the function of the ISC is not so clearly defined.

"We want to try and get some idea of what students expect from the ISC," said program co-ordinator David Brinton. Brinton is seeking advice from students on how to best utilize this university facility.

"Most people still think ISC means foreign student centre, instead of international student centre," explained Brinton. "Most Canadian students know where it is, but they don't know what it is, except the Engineers who use it for lunch."

Even though many groups use the centre for activities, there is little interaction between the various groups, according to Brinton, and Canadians aren't involved at all.

Future ISC activities include tentative plans for an international film festival.

Students to discuss OSAP

By MARK BUFFIN

The student council (SAC) has called Harry Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, to a public meeting at Convocation Hall to justify his modifications to the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP). He will be asked to come between November 2 and 10.

At a meeting of U of T Student Aid committee Tuesday, it was stated that student mobilization to endorse this meeting is essential to its existence. As of the time of the committee meeting, Parrott had not replied to the invitation.

The general opinion expressed at the meeting was that Parrott was "vague" towards the input from students he said he wanted at the recent Seneca College meeting on OSAP. It was felt that Parrott was reluctant to accept any input and that he was avoiding any criticism from U of T students by holding his meeting at Seneca College. The major contradiction in the program that emerged at the meeting was that equal opportunity in post-graduate study is lost if students from lower income backgrounds must leave school for financial reasons.

The Student Aid Committee will be approaching, among others, the deans of U of T faculties, the various student societies around campus, as well as off-campus groups, to endorse a brochure criticizing Parrott's OSAP modifications and calling for the Convocation Hall meeting. The brochure will be distributed across campus this week. It was emphasized that student support must be organized if this meeting is to take place.

SAC president John Tuzyk suggested that every one of the student societies should "get involved." He admitted that people might sign an endorsement of the brochure, but not otherwise participate.

There is an open meeting tentatively scheduled of the SAC Student Aid Committee October 28 at the SAC office.

Scientists not godlike

By BRIGITTE MERTLING

"What I fear is the scientist, filled with pride and wonder, who will assume the role of God." This is the feeling of David Suzuki, geneticist and broadcaster, who spoke Monday night in the Medical Sciences Auditorium. Suzuki appeared on behalf of the Institute for the History and Philosophy of Science and Technology, sponsors of the day-long symposium entitled "The Legacy of Jacob Bronowski".

The symposium was well attended in all three sessions. The morning seminar offered a number of talks on Bronowski and his work. The afternoon seminar featured three Bronowski films and another series of lectures in which science as a "liberal art" was discussed. In the evening, Suzuki spoke on "The New Titans: Science in the Modern Age".

U of T President John Evans, present at the last session, described the late Bronowski as "one of the most remarkable minds of our time." Bronowski, creator of the internationally-known television series "The Ascent of Man", is considered one of the most influential scholars of this century and the father of "scientific humanism".

In his characteristically entertaining fashion, Suzuki also expressed concern over the role of modern science in contemporary society. He explained how the advances of science and technology are being "swept along by great forces" and scientists are "generally misunderstood" by the lay public because "ignorance is the breeding ground for superstition." Seasoning his speech with colorful examples from Roszak, Hegel and Nazi Germany, Suzuki described how scientists "aspire to become angels." In conclusion, he stressed the importance of the "demystification of science," so that its "beauty" can emerge; he felt that science "louches all very profoundly."

Evans made a short closing address in which he termed Suzuki "the first approximation to Bronowski," and described his lecture as "the beginnings of a new humility."

For the most part, those attending were impressed with the day's events, commenting on the "informative, human approach". Some, though, were not so pleased, as expressed by spectator Ian Brown: "Bronowski's delivery is so slow and pedantic that it is almost to the point of being excruciatingly painful to sit through it."

The symposium also honored the acquisition by U of T of the entire collection of Bronowski's papers, a donation by his widow, Rita Bronowski. The collection will be kept in the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library on the St. George Campus.

Geneticist David Suzuki: "What I fear is the scientist."

Slotback Again: No Bid Deal For Sam

By HUGH STUART

Sam Sinopoli is glad to be back at slotback.

So far this season, it has been running back John Goodrow, and receiver Chris Kotsopoulos who have put most of the Blues' points on the board. Therefore, the Western Mustangs will have to adjust their defence to stop this pair. If they are successful the Blues will have to diversify their attack, in which case slot back Sam Sinopoli may play a key role.

Sinopoli started the season at tight end but was moved to slot back when the coaches decided that they had to get Goodrow more running room. The versatile Sinopoli must have had a feeling of déjà vu when told of the move because last year he was forced to make a similar move when Brent Elsey was injured. This suits the Faculty of Education student just fine because he would rather play slot back.

The Sinopoli move has paid dividends in the last few games as the Blues' offence has regained its early season form. It is encouraging to note that Sinopoli has emerged as a strong ball carrier and receiver. Last week against York he recorded a 23 yard reception and a 12 yard gain on a reverse. Like any backfielder, he would like to get the ball more and his wish may be fulfilled this Saturday at Western.

Last year the Central Tech graduate was drafted by the Argos. He went to the professional team's training camp and although he felt he had a good camp, he was cut. Sinopoli is uncertain as to whether he will give the Argos another shot.

"It depends on whether I get a job, but I have no overwhelming desire to play pro ball," explained Sinopoli.

However, the slot back's thoughts are on this year and the team's chances for a College Bowl victory. According to Sinopoli, "This is it for U of T. After this year, a lot of veterans will be leaving so the next few years will probably be rebuilding seasons. I think we'll go all the way this year because we've added the element that was missing last year; spirit. Plus none of us veterans have forgotten last year either."

One thing is certain: if Sinopoli plays the major role that is expected of him during the Blues' drive to the College Bowl, the Argos, or any other team will think twice before letting him go again.

Interfac Report

By ANDY AUZINS

As we wind on down the road, and the football season draws to a close, the playoffs draw near and the vanquished hang up their cleats.

Scarborough College continues its domination of the Interfac Football league, remaining undefeated and largely unchallenged. Scarborough romped over the Engineers 35-0. Shard McKee led the way with three TD's and Russ Henderson backed him up with two more.

You almost have to concede the Scarborough team the Mullock Cup. It is offensive strength that drives this team and in interfac, rarely do good offenses develop because of the short season allotted to football. When a team is able to demonstrate offensive prowess it is generally because of individual talent in the key positions. Scarborough fills those key positions with the best talent in interfac. Defending Scarborough has not been easy and none has succeeded in limiting their attack. Whether or not Scarborough wins the championship will largely depend on the strength of the opposition's defense.

In other action C. Uil, J. Ring, M. Palluzzi and D. St. John each scored touchdowns for New College as it defeated U.C. 26-22 in a tight contest.

Dave Pandy got two and teammate Pete Zyone got another for University College.

Victoria College gained revenge over St. Mike's with a close, tough battle that ended with Vic on top 3-0. Don Paterson kicked the only points of the defensive struggle with his field goal.

Lacrosse - The peace-loving Erindalers (my mistake before) exceeded their season's penalty total in one game last week. No doubt they were incited to some degree as their opposition amassed twice as many penalties. Erindale still prevailed 17-6 over New. Rory O'Neill and Murray Barrick got five goals each to lead the Erindalers to another victory and preservation of their undefeated record.

Scarborough made short work of the Engineers trouncing them 17-2. Dale McNeil got both tallies for the Engineers while Ed Evans with six, and Dave Robertson and Gord Stillick with four apiece, perpetrated the rout.

Cosimo Crupi and Ed Gal got three each for St. Mike's as they eked out a narrow 7-6 decision over the Phys Ed team.

Hockey Blues Travel South

By JIM O'LEARY

The hockey Blues hit the road for the first time this season as they travel south of the border to play Michigan State in a two-game exhibition series on Friday and Saturday. The weekend series marks the first time Toronto has played a Big Ten school since Tom Watt became coach 12 years ago.

This series will also be the first time this season the 1977-78 version of the Blues will hit the ice together. Watt made his final roster cuts this past weekend.

Watt says he is not anxious to play in the United States. In his opinion there is enough good competition in Canada. The Blues should be promoting the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union rather than playing in the U.S.

It is also more difficult for the Blues to win when they play in the United States. The referees are not of the same calibre as in Canada, they play under National Collegiate Athletic Association (N.C.A.A.) rules and they always play before hostile audiences.

Why then does Toronto play in the United States? The answer is quite simple according to Watt. It is a matter of money. The rich American universities pay all the Blues' expenses as well as guaranteeing them a certain amount of the gate receipts.

In order to play a weekend tournament in Canada the Blues would have to pick up the tab for their expenses. For example, Watt says "We couldn't afford to play at Lakehead."

Watt does not like to play exhibition games against Canadian colleges. He feels that over the season the Blues play more than enough games against their southern Ontario opponents. To play any more games would lessen the excitement of regular season.

It would seem simple for Toronto to play exhibition games against their cross town rivals from York. But according to Watt, the Blues meet York enough in the regular season. To play them anymore would only lessen the rivalry which has been developed between these two.

Ideally, Watt would like to play Major Junior A, or Senior A teams, these teams supply good competition as well as stirring fans interest. Unfortunately, their schedules make it difficult to arrange such games.

Although Watt knows very little about the Michigan team he figures they must be pretty good. They would not have invited the defending national champion Blues, unless they thought they had a good chance of winning.

Although it will probably be difficult, Watt is confident his team can come up with the type of team effort that carried them through the 1976-77 season and come home with a couple of victories.

Tom Watt prepares his team for the trip to Michigan.

Win For Women's Tennis

By SHERYN POSEN

The Women's Intercollegiate Tennis Team travelled to Waterloo Saturday for the preliminary matches of the Ontario Women's Athletic Association doubles championship. The team won seven out of nine matches placing them within reach of the championship to be decided this weekend in London.

Defending singles and doubles title holder, Pam Gollish paired with Pam McGibbon and placed first in their fight for an undefeated record. Experience proved a factor as the Toronto team rallied from behind to overtake a powerful Western team.

Sheryn Posen and Nancy Guest, newcomers to the intercollegiate team, defeated teams from McMaster and Brock before losing to a strong York pair. Veterans, Carla Mann and Lynda Harley, also completed the day with two wins and one loss, defeating both Guelph and Brock but losing to a team from

McMaster

Coach Grant, impressed with the results, is looking forward to a good showing in the upcoming finals.

SMC Sinks Engineers; Escape From Basement

By HUGH STUART

The Los Angeles Dodgers were not the only team with their backs against the wall this week. The SMC football team was in a similar position, needing a victory to escape from the cellar position they shared with Victoria College. Like the Dodgers on Saturday, the 'Choirboys' came away with an impressive, but much less comfortable, 16-13 victory over the Engineers in their Monday afternoon meeting.

It was a significant win for St. Mike's, not only in terms of the standings, but also due to the fact that the SMC offense finally showed some of the spark that has been missing since their opening game victory over Victoria. The sixteen points St. Mike's put on the board was the most the team has scored this season . . . and it almost wasn't enough.

To set the stage, with the score 13-13 and just over three minutes left in the game, the Engineers fumbled near midfield. Although SMC could not get their drive with a touchdown, Leon nailed the field goal to give St. Mike's an apparent 16-13 victory.

But, to use a cliché, the Engineers were down but not out. Combining the pass and the run, Skule marched the ball down to the SMC three yard line. The drive stalled when the SMC defence finally showed why they were nicknamed the Purple Papal Eaters during the early season. They made an impressive goal line stand, stopping the Engineers when on third and goal they went for the touchdown. Unfortunately for the Engineers, a perfect throw was fumbled in the SMC end zone and the game was lost.

In retrospect, the Engineer coaches must be second guessing themselves. The reason for this is that on an earlier touchdown they went for a two point conversion and missed. If they had kicked the single point, a field goal in the last minute would have given Skule the victory.

Flynn and Trudel accounted for the SMC markers while Medal and Laidlaw countered for the Engineers. Leon booted Iantorno 4-1 to produce the margin of victory.

Now all eyes turn to the Scarborough-Victoria encounter where Vic will attempt to move into a tie with the Engineers and St. Mike's (at 2 and 3), and Scr will attempt to keep their perfect record intact.

If you're sick go somewhere else

By SLAN STEWART

If you can't pay your medical bills you won't be able to re-register or graduate, if the report of the Health Service Working Group is adopted. But students won't have to worry about bills for infirmary care, because the Infirmary will be abolished.

The Health Service Working Group was established last March by the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee to investigate ways in which the university Health Service could be operated on a "no-net-cost" basis by 1978-9. Its report, presented to Internal Affairs Committee meeting on Tuesday, calls for an increase in the Health Service fee for full-time students from $12.50 to $16, a reduction of $50,000 in the budget of the Psychiatric division, a more thorough bill collection and the closing of the infirmary at the end of the 1978-79 academic year.

Working Group Chairman John Burnes told the Internal Affairs Committee that students should make use of the better care at Mount Sinai and Toronto General Hospital for treatment of after-hour ills. Burnes said that students would not notice any effect upon the day to day operation of the Health Service.

Health Service Director George Wodehouse and Psychiatric Division

Chief T. Statten were on hand to dispute that claim during a two-hour debate on the report. Wodehouse said that some of the Working Group's revenue expectations were "wishful thinking" and that it is wrong to expect that significant cuts can be made without reducing services: "I can assure you, we're hurting, and this is going to hurt not only us, but the university community." Statten said that psychiatric services would be "wiped out" by the budget cut and staff hiring restrictions.

Student representative Chris Rogers urged the committee to decide whether it can approve the "no-net-cost" principle before it considers the Working Group Report at its next meeting. But Rose Wolfe noted that Internal Affairs had fought the Budget Committee over the principle last year unsuccessfully, and declared that it would be "an exercise in futility" to reopen the issue.

Internal Affairs Chairman Peter Neilson told The Varsity that the committee would probably discuss the no-net-cost issue at its next meeting: "I think we have a responsibility to say what we feel, but I don't think that it's going to get us anywhere."

Students flock to colleges

By BLAIR HUNTER

Community college enrolment in Ontario for the 1977-78 session is up, and if this is indicative of a trend we may all be headed there ourselves.

When contacted by The Varsity, Toronto's community colleges all acknowledged that the percentage of transfer students (students with a degree or a partial university education) seeking a community college education is on the rise.

What is drawing students away from the University campus to the community college?

Humber College Registrar Fred Embry said, "The tighter job market is causing students to want a more practical working education."

Sheridan College Coordinator of Information Services Joanne Emerson, in noting the 4.1 per cent increase in this year's full time day student population, said, "Each institution, whether a university or a community college, serves its own specialized function, but the steady increase in Sheridan's enrolment over the past five years may show that this type of preparation for the work force is becoming more popular."

As jobs in the teaching profession become impossible or harder to find, has the three or four year university program ceased to be a reasonable endeavour for students to undertake?

Murray Grossner, in a Financial Post article 'New policies are needed to provide jobs for the young' (October 8, 1977), cites a recent Ontario Economic Council on Development report on unemployment. The report links the youth unemployment problem in part with the "liberal arts, social or even pure science (programs) which do not have direct correspondence to the needs of industry or public services."

An anonymous source at Seneca College said students turn to this type of education not so much for "an apprenticeship, but for real experience with immediate application to the job market."

Representatives of the Community colleges contacted did agree that for their own "funding reasons" new enrolment had to be limited to a certain degree, and that the demand for places in the schools was greater than the ability to provide them.

Poverty not related to population growth

By SA'ADA A. SAIDULLAH

The victims of national and international poverty were the subject of two lectures Wednesday. The second Towards 2077 Sesquicentennial lecture, on "Poverty in the Third World - And in Ours," held in the Medical Sciences Auditorium, attracted about 300 people.

David Hopper, President of the Canadian International devoted himself to an exposition of the "so called" causes of poverty in the underdeveloped countries and the critical importance of their need to obtain the "fullest possible participation" in the international political process.

"The transformation of the scientific and technological bases of a society from the traditional application of agriculture into the modern industrial field "was a revolutionary activity," said Hopper. The undeveloped economies are predominately agrarian and characterized by "low productivity per worker," he said. So the comparatively small population of the industrialized countries collect 75 per cent of the 5.5 trillion global Gross National Product (GNP), the numerous inhabitants of the under-industrialized countries draw less than 25 per cent of the world's annual flow of goods and services, said Hopper.

Hopper dismissed the argument that population growth causes poverty. He pointed out that the contribution of each additional human being to society is roughly equal to the average product of its workers. Population growth rates are slowing down in India and other poor nations. However, by the year 2077, world population is likely to be 12-15 billion, compared to 4 billion today, and that three-quarters of this figure will be in the poor countries, compared to two-thirds today.

A failure of the "trickle down effect" has been observed in some undeveloped countries, according to Hopper. "The exploitation of the agrarian sector for palaces and military ventures may lead to class-conflict according to some," he said. However, the worsening of conditions of the poor in these countries must be considered in light of the fact that "the additions to income in Canada did not trickle down for at least two generations."

Hopper pointed out that there are two basic approaches to solving the problem of poverty: the encouragement of growth and the "satisfaction of basic human needs." He warned, however, that the "countries may be foisted with expensive welfare systems by outside agencies."

CANADIAN POVERTY

R. C. Baetz, a recently elected parliamentary assistant to Attorney General Roy McMurtry, spoke for about half an hour on "The Canadian Poor" after Hopper.

He quoted from an Economic Council of Canada report that "poverty in Canada is real - it persists at a time when Canadians enjoy some of the highest incomes in the world - it is shameful."

In Canada the "poor are a minority, about 20 per cent who can be dominated by the middle-class." In addition, in Canada, "half the poor are working." This is not surprising given the fact that the very highest minimum wage earner can only support about 1.5 persons, said Baetz.

Baetz claimed that there were six main sources of poverty. An examination of the causes allows us to "put a handle on the poor."

"Life - cycle poverty" affects people at predictable times, he said. "Canada was the slowest to protect people against such poverty. The pension plan and other forms of assistance "have allowed us to move to the forefront in the last decade," said Baetz.

There has been "little done to help on the other side of the life-cycle. This is consistent with the prevailing conviction that the prime responsibility of child rearing should be borne by parents, not society," said Baetz. The low birth-rate projected for the 1980s led him to predict that the government would be led to "give monetary incentives to prevent the extinction of our life style."

Baetz felt that the "only hope for the chronically dependent, is to become employed. There has been progress in getting them work." He also pointed out that poverty spawns poverty though it is not as bad as in the U.S.A.: "It is particularly distressing that such poverty is found in our native people," stated Baetz.

Royalty at the Regatta

By E. SHAW-COLYER

The Silver Jubilee Regatta held in Ottawa's Rideau Canal last weekend may not have been the most decisive victory for U of T's rowing team, but it was an event crew members will remember for some time to come.

The regatta, attracting the "creme-de-la-creme" of the rowing world in Canada and the U.S., also attracted Queen Elizabeth, who arrived near the close of the afternoon to present the awards for the fastest times. From a pavilion above the lake the Queen watched a dash on the course, staged in her honor.

A breakdown in telephone communications delayed the official times; the Queen, however, waited until they arrived in spite of fidgeting officials.

Following the presentation, she descended the hill through the ranks of oars held aloft by members of the participating team.

Noticing the U of T crest on Toronto coxswain Maurice DeWolf's shirt, the Queen stopped and asked after the team's success. She then asked team member Bobby Boraks how he "managed to accomplish all this with your school work and other obligations." At the same time Prince Philip questioned Peter McKenna about the success of the U of T rowing team. The dialogue continued while photographers shot off rolls of film of the royal couple and the rowers.

The Varsity - Alex Sochanivskyj

Hockey Ho!!!

Tuesday night the Senior Field Hockey team travelled to Guelph and demolished the opposition in an exhibition match. Although Coach Liz Hoffman was hoping to try some new defensive strategy, the final score of 9-0 indicates that the defence was not unduly tested. Anne Hofland, Cathy "York" Brown, and Donna Allaby shared the goals.

The half-backs, led by Cathy "Tiger-Lily" Brown, managed to keep most of the play above the fifty yard line and feed the forwards, who capitalized on the many opportunities.

The Guelph match was a tune-up for Part 1 of the Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Championships to be held this week-end. The defence will be the key to the upcoming matches against the strongest competitor's, York, McGill and Queen's. Both teams are defending champions and are hoping to retain their titles. Coach Jane Wilton has moulded a strong and determined team whose toughest competition will be against Queen's and Laurentian.

Both teams play at Scarborough College and all fans are more than welcome. Keeping in mind that the next world Championships will be held in Vancouver in 1979, perhaps this is your opportunity to learn the intricacies of an increasingly popular international sport.

Student appeals have a chance, with help

By GEORGE COOK

Appealing marks or having grievances dealt with at U of T can be like finding your way through the labyrinth. In the end all you may end up with is a recalcitrant Minotaur not particularly sympathetic to your plight.

But there are ways of slaying the beast.

To a certain extent, having grievances heard is an informal process, according to university ombudsman Eric McKee. Students can go directly to the professors involved or to their college registrar with their problems.

Although the ombudsman has no power to change decisions that have been made, he can investigate, inform and assist students who have problems.

He deals with everything from problems with fees to problems with the U of T parking authority.

In other cases the student may wish to speak to the chairman of the department with which they have problems. Lorna Marsden, chairman of the Department of Sociology, said, for example, that in terms of problems with the department "the buck stops with the chairman."

The course unions can be a useful place to seek information and help about appeals or grievances. Sometimes the course unions act as ombudsmen in a dispute.

Terri Weatherhead, field worker for the Arts and Science Student Union (ASSU), recalled a case in which ASSU helped a student get results — unofficially. "This student claimed the professor had a personal dislike for her and that he had given her a poor mark on her term work because of it," she said. ASSU approached the professor, who gave the student a high mark on the final exam. "It all equalled out in the end and she got the mark she thought she deserved," Weatherhead said.

Where a student is having problems ASSU will put him in touch with the people best able to help.

The Students' Administrative Council (SAC) also provides information about grievances and appeals, according to John Tuzyk, SAC president.

SAC, however, prefers not to get directly involved in grievances or appeals unless there is a political issue at stake, Tuzyk said. A case of racism affecting a student's work at U of T would be such an issue, he maintained.

Tuzyk added that SAC provides funds to the Campus Legal Aid Centre for the purpose of helping students with appeals.

There are, at present, two official routes of academic appeal. If a student wants a paper remarked or permission to write an exam on a different date from the scheduled one, for example, he first must go through his faculty. This means petitioning.

The Faculty of Arts and Science has what is called the Committee on Standing which reviews the documents presented by the student to support his case.

If the ruling is not favorable, the student can go on to the other official route of appeal. The sub-committee on appeals, under the auspices of the Governing Council, hears appeals from the student himself or from his legal council.

Asked whether she believed students were treated fairly by the sub-committee, Jane Bowly, one of two student representatives on the sub-committee, said yes and went on to explain why. "The Committee on Standing just gets documents," she said, and added that the sub-committee on Academic Appeals deals more directly with the student.

"It looks more formal than it is. You're much more involved with the student if you're looking at him than if you're just looking at a piece of paper."

Most appeals have to do with getting into or out of courses, without academic penalty, or with having marks changed, she stated.

The sub-committee grants about 50 percent of the appeals it hears, according to Bowly.

If the appeal is still not accepted by the sub-committee, the student can go directly to the Governing Council.

Last year, however, only one appeal made it that far.

Uof T Press: books don't balance

By PHILIP LIBMAN

The University of Toronto Press came under fire at the Business Affairs Committee meeting last Wednesday. A conspicuous discrepancy in the Press' financial year-end statements was pointed out by student representative Phil Ryan. Under Ryan's persistent questioning, with some help from committee Vice-chairman W.B. Coutts, the statement was tabled pending further investigation.

Normally, the approval of a financial statement is a routine matter, since actual budgets go on to Governing Council for debate. Statements are open to anyone interested in them at the Governing Council secretariat said W.H. Broadhurst, Chairman of the committee.

Ryan observed that in the actual 76-77 budget for the Press, interest expense was listed at $44,683, while in the financial statement, it was listed at $124,479.

The difference was explained by M.E. Dedrick, Director of Financial Services at U of T, as the interest charge to the U of T bookstore on its inventory. Therefore last year the bookstore was charged $80,000 in interest by the Press.

The financial statement of the Press does not include all items as do other U of T institutions, because, as Coutts explained, "there is only one figure for the Press' instead of detailed figures on the three divisions of publications, the bookstore and printing), as they do not like to show too much detail of their commercial operations because of competition he said. He felt, however, that "book store results should be shown differently."

Ryan stated that this method of accounting "is not an accurate picture of the U of T Press." He said it represents a loss of accountability to the Governing Council by the U of T Press because of the financial statements.

With Coutts in agreement, the committee then voted to table the report and to find out further why U of T Press didn't comply.

FIRE PROTECTION

The committee also approved the U of T Fire Protection Policy. These are standards developed by the Physical Plant Department, which in addition to the minimum requirements demanded by the Fire Marshal Act of Ontario and the City of Toronto building by-laws, also requires that automatic sprinkler systems be installed in all portions of new buildings, and that ionization fire detectors be installed where these sprinklers are not.

It was pointed out that last July the university came very close to losing its fire insurance coverage. With the fire at the Sandford Fleming Building, insurance brokers were not happy with the fire protection offered at many old U of T buildings. It was felt that this new policy casts a favorable reflection on U of T.

The cost is coming out of U of T's capital funds, and so far $400,000 has been earmarked for the program.

A discussion of the Overview of the Pension Plan for staff was tabled pending receipt of a report from the Presidential Pension Review Committee, and the University of Toronto Faculty Association (UTFA) agreement.

Lectron's eye-on library lethargy

By JEFF BUCKSTEIN

Physics professor Dr. E. Lectron told 2,000 U of T students assembled under the stars at the corner of Jarvis and Dundas Streets last Monday night that studying regularly at the Roberts Library could cause failing grades.

The speech, delivered at a symposium entitled "Sleepy Students at Roberts: What to do" specified that the danger came from the fluorescent lighting in the building.

"The fluorescent lights at Roberts emit an overbalance of positive ions into the atmosphere," said the 42-year-old professor. "An ion is a charged atom or molecule that has either lost or picked up an electron. Usually there is a conservation or balance of negative and positive charges. But an imbalance of positive ions can create lethargy, depression and plain laziness. I'm told there are more students sleeping at any given time in the Roberts than in any other 14-storey triangular-shaped university library on the continent."

Chemistry professor Dr. Chem E. Kollage, 37, substantiated Lectron's theory. "Lectron's my best friend. He wouldn't lie."

Veteran psychology professor, Dr. Molly Cule, age 112, who has taught at U of T since 1888, said "when positive ions are released in excess, as they are in the Roberts, they tend to leave a person feeling pretty low."

Cule added: "I've seen a lot of students come and go in my day. The Laurier gang of '96, the war class of '14, Depression group of '32, Elvis fans of '57 and the protest group of '68. But nowhere have I ever seen a more stupid, lethargic group than the class of '77. And its only been in the last five years, since the Roberts was constructed, that I've noticed the educational standard dropping so low.

"It's my contention that students' mental outlook is being affected by these ions — it makes them so downhearted that they give up easily, and just loaf around. Have you ever been to Roberts and actually seen somebody working? You find students with their heads on the desks, asleep. Or they're slumped over in some easy chair."

When asked what could be done to combat the problem, Cule suggested that every student entering Roberts be equipped with an "ion machine" which has recently hit the market and is designed to restore a balance of negative ions to the immediate atmosphere.

Kollage agreed with Cule's proposed solution. "An ion machine is a wonderful idea. As it stands now, it's hard to keep an ion the beautiful girls and work at the same time."

Well, while your communal "brains" slowly putrify into a mush of hate and Red blood, and as responsible journalism runs away from the disgusting smell of your filth: We, the Student Body, will bury you! This campus is not with you, it never can be while you persist in peddling such politically biased hate literature. SAC and The Varsity will go the way of all flesh, but the student body will still remain.

Excerpt from an unprintable letter to The Varsity.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Newsweb Enterprise. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university.

The Varsity is managed by the Varsity Committee which is responsible for the management, financial policies, and editorial integrity of The Varsity.

An express function of the committee is to receive and consider complaints about the paper. Formal complaints — as opposed to letters to the editor — should be addressed to The Chairman, Varsity Committee, 91 St. George St., Toronto, Ontario.

Letters & Opinions

Letters should be double-spaced and typed on a 64-character line. They should be signed (anonymous letters will not be printed) and should include the writer's telephone number. The deadline for printing letters on a given publishing day is noon that day.

Reply to Trots

To the Editors,

You are no doubt aware of the Trotskyist League's contributions on the Plyushch affair and my response to their positions.

When I wrote the letter titled 'Plyushch Defended' I made it as short as possible in order to ensure its inclusion in an issue of The Varsity. By necessity I was able to deal only with the most general impression that the Trotskyist League created through its contributions.

Their response to my letter in the October 12 issue, however, demanded from me a thorough reply to the main points. I have tried to keep it short, at least as short as their original article titled "An answer for Ukrainian dissident Plyushch". I hope that you can include it at your earliest possible opportunity.

For the Trotskyist League (TL), the realm of politics is a relatively simple one. All political struggles are doomed until they embrace a Trotskyist analysis and programme à la TL. Before that magic moment arrives, the TL is satisfied to act as the guardian of revolutionary truth without in the least feeling obliged to dirty its blessed analysis in the grubby practical world of less-than-Trotskyist politics. It merely waits for its mirror image to rise up from the struggle and to recognize that the "correct analysis" was there all along. Praxis is for the masses, knowledge for the party.

The Plyushch affair is a case in point. It does not surprise us that, for all its passionate exhortations to Plyushch to "reach the full and uniquely Trotskyist understanding" on the Soviet question, the TL betrays a gross ignorance of the oppositional struggle there today and has been unable, in the space of two lengthy Varsity articles, to identify any of its tendencies. It is enough, they claim for communists to "sharply distinguish between oppositionists who defend Marxism against bureaucratic perversion and those who seek a return to the system of capitalist exploitation." The TL evidently believes that it is all a war of words to defend Marxism from 'perversion'; they don't even know what these words are, and more importantly that these words represent a living struggle that demands support from the workers' movement internationally.

That Pyotr Grigorenko has repeatedly sent letters and appeals to the Western Communist Parties and the international labour movement for their support to the struggle for democratic rights and has yet to receive an answer is of little importance to these champions of proletarian democracy. That the leaders of the Union of Communards who issued the newspaper Kolokol in the late 60's under the banner "From the Dictatorship of the Bureaucracy to the Dictatorship of the Proletariat" today languish in labour camps is a trifle matter. Danylo Shumuk, a Ukrainian oppositionist and former member of the Communist Party of Western Ukraine has spent 34 years of his life in prisons, the majority of them in the Soviet Union. And Mustafa Dzemilev, a Crimean Tatar nationalist and leader of his people's struggle to return to their homeland from which they were deported en masse in 1944 might as well avail himself of repeated hunger strikes for all that the TL is prepared to do to secure his freedom.

We can only question these "Trotskyists", who claim "they understand the nature of Stalinist persecution" for "their's is the heritage of the Left Opposition wiped out by Stalin and his henchmen" and who do not even feel an elementary duty to expose the conspiracy of silence around the Soviet oppositionists' struggle today, as to their real purpose in howling about the defense of the USSR. The TL accuses me of "crude defamations" when I ask them their reasons for abstaining in this duty. But their October 12 response in The Varsity does not offer a single example to the contrary. They cannot answer the question.

While defending democratic rights and workers' democracy (a tokenistic and verbal defense the TL makes at other organizations' meetings) the October 12 letter is quick to point out that this defense must be inextricably linked to a defense of the gains already accomplished by the October Revolution: the destruction of capitalist property relations, the right to work, etc. Otherwise, activists engaged in this work, such as Plyushch, "become the witting or unwitting pawn of pro-imperialist anti-communists". We agree with the TL if what they mean is that defense of the oppositional struggle cannot be identified with anti-communism, but must be put forward as part of the struggle of the Soviet masses for total democratic control over their labour, their communities and the state.

But the TL does not advance this position as a political qualification to defense work, as a necessary guard against traditional anti-communist manipulation of the issue. Rather, it concedes the admissibility of defense work "within the framework of the defense of the gains of the October Revolution". And that framework, a defensive one, advises the TL that the main task today is to defend the Soviet Union from Carter's cynical human rights declarations, not to advance the struggle of the opposition against the Stalinist system.

And it has been to no other end that this hopelessly confused groupuscule has cried wolf before Carter's statements, his "thermonuclear sabre rattling to bring human rights to Kiev and Leningrad". The TL fabricates the danger of war to confirm its choice of line and counts the democratic defense of oppositionists as a contributing factor to Carter's verbal and military arsenal. Does the TL suggest, as does the Communist Party, that a denunciation of Stalinist brutalities in the Soviet Union can only be an act of cowardice?

In spite of its avowed identification with the Left Opposition (an opposition that organized hunger strikes in the camps in the 1930's with persecuted Baptists) the TL refuses to defend oppositionists today. So it must throw up a screen to conceal its sectarianism and timidity: defense of the USSR is counterposed to the defense of the opposition. Not only do they worship the accomplished fact alongside the Stalinist two-camp theory of world political struggle; in fact their positions depend upon it. Luckily, the socialist public is spared the disquieting introduction of another factor into this scheme, that of the opposition to Stalinism in the Soviet Union and a progressive movement attempting to mobilize international solidarity with the oppositional struggle. This fact explains why the TL hasn't the least inclination to break the conspiracy of silence around it.

The Trotskyist League cries 'Stalinist slander' when I accuse them of raising "the old familiar cry to the effect that criticism of the state of Soviet affairs... constitutes an attack upon socialism." It is a Stalinist slander, and in this case it is used by you against defense work.

But while the Soviet Union is far away, the TL has had an opportunity to speak to Plyushch face to face. We can only agree with the League that Plyushch has equivocated on the question of Carter's Human Rights campaign. While pointing to the need to analyze the roots of the Soviet regime's suppression of democratic rights, he has not tried to understand the roots of the U.S. government's defense of these rights. Rather he considers it 'objectively' in the interests of the opposition's fight.

But the TL is not satisfied to say that Plyushch, while certainly a socialist and an anti-Stalinist, is confused on the Carter issue and undoubtedly wrong. If he is not imbued with the TL's position, then certainly he must be an inveterate reactionary. But it is not so easy to make Plyushch into "an imperialist whore", a "class traitor", an "enemy of the rights of all working people". So the TL must resort to slander, fabrication and distortion. Conveniently ignoring Plyushch's call at the Toronto meeting for a counter conference of oppressed peoples and classes to the Belgrade conference of governments, the TL rests its case on the fabrication that he is making "an open, direct and unequivocal appeal to U.S. imperialism and its West European allies." Those who were at the Toronto meeting will recall that Plyushch discussed the issue of building a revolutionary party in the Soviet Union as a concrete task and pointed out the immense difficulties involved in organizing even an elementary network of activity and solidarity for democratic rights. To build a party today, a mass, revolutionary and disciplined movement was a utopian suggestion, he said. And if the TL, which does not bother with such practical difficulties cannot understand the fantasy of their demand, then, suggested Plyushch, they should go to the Soviet Union and investigate the conditions themselves. The TL's accusation is based on conscious distortion, a practice we can demonstrate in numerous other instances.

Together with the Communist Party and the Ukrainian nationalists, the TL is prepared to explain Plyushch's failure to see the light as a direct result of "Brezhnev's Torture Chambers". The CP raised this experience to prove his insanity; the nationalists to explain why he was still a Marxist after leaving the Soviet Union; the TL to explain that it made him unfit to remain a communist.

But one need go no further than the contributions this dishonest sect makes to The Varsity to show how divorced it is from reality. In front of Plyushch, the TL calls him "Comrade" (Sept. 21 Varsity). In the same article, he becomes an imperialist whore. The divorce has assumed schizophrenic proportions.

Gorilla grumbles

Urban Gorilla is perhaps the most amateurish piece of purified dung we have ever seen in black and white. It's about as funny as mother's day in an orphanage.

We feel it is both anti-conscious and fascist; thus we protest its appearance in U of Tedium's newspaper. A column on transcendental granola appreciation would be more in tune with the wishes and desires of the student body.

Unless Urban Gorilla is removed post-haste from the newspaper, we'll have Orca the killer whale do on your typewriter.

Punk rock sidelines real rebellion

By ERIC McMILLAN

The Varsity has carried a lot of material lately glorifying punk rock. This trend in rock music has been widely promoted in Toronto and The Varsity should be aware of the kind of campaign it is taking part in.

Punk is being pushed as the music of rebellion when in reality it is another scheme cooked up by people interested only in profits and protecting their power from attack by genuine youthful revolt. This punk lifestyle is so "anti-establishment" that both Eatons and Simpsons have come out with fall lines of punk rock fashions. It is so "underground" that Macleans, the Globe and Mail and most other media started publicizing it long before most of today's few punk rockers finally caught on. It is so iconoclastic that record companies, promoters, and other businesses have plastered posters all over town, produced glossy album covers, backed punk rock "showcase" events, and pushed punk numbers on the airwaves.

Moreover, when you look at the content and style of the music and punk paraphernalia, you quickly discover there's nothing new about it. It resurrects the absolute worst of past decaying cultures: racism, sexism, nihilism, mindless aggression, decay, and the symbolism and ideology of nazism.

One of the founders of punk rock, David Bowie, has often expressed his admiration of Hitler and the fascist movement in Britain. Punk heroes such as Nattee Dog and Johnny Rotten would be jokes were it not that they promote to varying degrees criminally vicious anti-people attitudes.

Although this is being sold as a backlash against 1960's music having gone soft, a little investigation shows that punk is being used in the same way that various "New Waves" of rock and pop music were used in the last decade.

In the 1960's there was a widespread upsurge against racial discrimination, U.S. aggression in Vietnam and Cambodia, and authority on the campuses. By the end of the decade this was being sidetracked into the so-called counter-culture. Being a flower-child or drug addict was supposed to be rejecting society's values.

Dylan, the Beatles, and the acid rock groups of San Francisco lived high off the hog posing as figures of rebellion. Never mind that all the accoutrements of hippiedom were provided by enterprising businessmen. Or that the record companies cleaned up. Or that everyone involved in the counter-culture then could tell you that the biggest dope dealers around were the police. Or that Pierre Trudeau and other rich people were quite content to tell young people to hit the road and live the life of hippies. The objective of turning young people away from rebellion into self-absorbed quitters and of discrediting progressive politics was accomplished — for a while.

Today the economy is in an irreparable mess. Prices continue to rise as wages are held back. Masses of young people cannot find employment and face an even bleaker future. Politicians have talked about this "time-bomb" which threatens to "destabilize" society and have answered by cutting unemployment benefits, cutting services, and starting up programs like Katimavik (known as "Barney's Brownshirts" in reference to the Hitler Youth of the 1930's) for young people.

In the midst of this crisis, along comes this fad of punk rock. If you're fed up, the answer is to tear your clothing, act like a Troglodyte, and engage in stupid violence and brutal sex. Moreover, this trick against young people tries to sneak in racist, sexist, anti-conscious fascism as a lifestyle.

But young people and students are not going to fall for this manipulation. In England certain punk rockers cannot walk the streets in full regalia for fear of being beaten up by working class youth who have a powerful hate for Hitlerism. People are not so ignorant as to accept glossy posters and not ask where they are coming from and why. It is easily recognized that the interests of those who would like to see punk rock degeneracy catch on among young people do not have the same interests as most of the youth themselves. A student newspaper which acts in the interests of students should not join in this propagation of anti-people garbage.

Lying on his deathbed, Oscar Wilde spoke: "Either the wallpaper goes, or I do."

Quoted in Wenlock Edge's book, A Guide to Erotic Mollusks: Mussel of Love. Thanks go out this week to Blake Del Conte, Neil Michael Davidson, Paul Budra, Peter Noble, Kim Michasiw, John Wilson and my teammate Arthur Kaptainis.

The masthead changes as Smokeless Les succumbs to sleep, and Arthur Kaptainis takes over as the leader of our Classical Music dept. The editorship of the Theatre dept. falls solely on the stooped shoulders of the late John Wilson, as Boyd Neil and Bruce Wall gracefully step down. All of the departed will remain on the writing staff.

Apologies to the Curse for misrepresentation. Apologies to Michael Berman: we know you wouldn't eat it anyways. Meeting of the sub-editors at 402 Wellesley E., Monday at 8:00.

Les Canadiens are NOT the Habitants

My favourite anti-separatist joke: two old men in a bar, using foul but acceptable language, agree that the Quebecois can have any trade arrangements they want, can keep the revenues to the Seaway — but we get the Canadiens.

What is it about hockey? Is it a peculiarly Canadian pleasure, to see men extending themselves to their utmost limits, strength transformed to grace? Is the solitude of the solitary skater transferred to the musing spectator? What is the delight of the masses cheering their demi-gods of the moment? Is it a delight in superior style combined with local pride?

Finally — is the pride and delight shared by fans at any chicken-wire-fenced arena in Ontario the same feeling as that shared by the thousands of Forum faithful who eat, sleep, and drink hockey between games? That is the question arising from Rick Salutin's witty, observant, and sympathetic play Les Canadiens, which combines the playwright's own appreciation of the team's superlative past with the thesis that its significance has diminished following the election of the PQ.

The play is delightful, but I have an irresistible urge to contest Salutin's premises. To me, not a member of a conquered 'nation' but instead a healthily Anglo fan of Montreal's finesse, the Canadiens stand — as they do to Quebecois, I'm sure — for more than skill. They are the embodiment of the exotic Canada of two languages which seems fully realized in the innocent and ideal world of boards and ice. But to Salutin, the Canadiens are the only surviving example of co-operation between French and English. It's the difference between regarding a symbol as the embodiment of an idea or as the sole instance of it.

Les Canadiens suggests that in ice hockey, an obsession with French-Canadian males (and latterly their women) the true spirit and pride of French Canada has survived the occupying forces of British Canada. The notion seems to have more merit when Salutin details the rivalry, in the twenties and thirties, of the Maroons and Canadiens, than when he tries to maintain that the Plains of Abraham caused it all. Yes, it works out nicely on stage.

The play has itself evolved along with the political situation. Originally working on a dramatization of the Canadiens' history now the first portion of Les Canadiens, Salutin was struck with Ken Dryden's comment on the peculiar reaction of Forum fans to the game as the election results came in and diverted their attention. Around his reflections he structured a second act, detailing the events of November 15, 1976 as seen from inside the rink. After a roaring success at Montreal's Centaur Theatre, and following the growing assertiveness of Quebec, the second act has been totally reworked but still deals with the same theme.

Les Canadiens is a mock-up of a hockey game, one which brings a thrill into the blood. There is a pre-game warmup, where the cast skate nonchalantly about and take a little shooting practice. The organist warms us up. And the game's underway, vignette after well-constructed vignette.

The troupe of actors are to be congratulated for effectively reproducing the movements of men and women on ice. And marvelously mobile faces and very simple props increase the pleasure one receives from recognizing the protagonists, from the late lamented general Wolfe and Sir John A. (fabulous asides!) to Scotty Bowman, gnostic gnome. The access that Salutin had to club members of the last forty years shows as he presents thoroughly believable portraits of players and builders of the sport.

The owners don't come off too well; sometimes the players are not treated kindly either. The portrait of Bowman catches his weaknesses of presentation right on the mark, and Jean Beliveau comes across as a graceful non-achiever put out to pasture. The Richards seem sympathetically portrayed, Henri as a man comfortably retired, Maurice as a man absolutely unquenchable in his desire to win, win. The description by the Rocket of his physical need to score goals is undoubtedly the most compelling speech in the play; the audience totally silent, existed completely on the raw energy of one of the game's undoubted greats.

The first half dwells perhaps overlong on the career of Howie Morenz, of Stratford, who died in Montreal from dissipation and a game injury, eventually being buried from centre ice at the Forum. The second half, details the way 'Davey Kirk' (possibly Ken Dryden in the original, as he helped Salutin shape the play) reacts to the liberation of French-Canadian consciousness during election day. It contains a large block of dream-like acting which is saved from flabbiness only by fine acting and a very uncomfortable audience who were too involved in the subject matter to concern themselves with the failure of allegory and moralizing as dramatic devices.

The dialogue and overall writing of the play are a welcome relief from turgid dramaturgy. Humour and irony are present in both French and English (we are saved from voice-overs, those obnoxious fruits of barbaric bilingualism, save in the compulsive translation, every three words, by the Forum announcer). And the French used is certainly corn-flake box, with enough joulais pronunciation to make one think of stereo-typical habitants. But treading the thin line helps along Salutin's revelation of the true temper of Quebecois sentiment, even if, in an excellent scene involving the team and their French lessons, the adversion to the 'Anglos' is moderated by their hockey divinity.

Hockey or politics? It's not Drummond.

Les Canadiens is an evening of great entertainment if you are a hockey buff. It is also an interesting look at the way French Canada may well see English Canada, all the more interesting since a Toronto playwright has observed and recorded it. Still, I feel that Montreal Canadiens have their place in the hearts of those who have visions of Canada, not merely of Quebec.

Leafs? Canadiens? It may be the difference between games being played by Aristotelians or Platonists. But mainly, Borje Salutin sucks because he wears the wrong sweater. (Even though we'd trade half the voyageurs to get him). And my team will make the playoffs and keep the Stanley Spitoon in the country — if the country's still here in April.

Your parents will love it

"Starting Here, Starting Now", the current revue playing at the Hampton Court Hotel, offers Toronto settling, soothing, executive entertainment.

The formal atmosphere, trim crowd and astronomical prices for drinks wouldn't seem like the kind of combination to attract the average Varsity reader.

The subject matter of the songs is directed at a complacent, middle-aged audience: things like marital failure, suggestive sexy scenes, true love, life in general. Some of the songs are quaintly amusing but more often they are sexist, with the girls clinging to the only male member of the cast.

The tunes fit into the pattern too. They are set to a typical dining lounge accompaniment of piano and double bass. A few of the melodies are pleasant at the moment but not memorable. The rest are really unmusical and don't serve as very good vehicles for the performers, who do their best anyway.

It is the three stars of the show who keep the evening lively, especially Judy Marshak, who puts all of her vibrant personality into each of the numbers. Her enormous voice can fill every corner of the room. It makes up for songs that are not particularly entertaining. T he best example of her talents is a rendition of "I'm Going to Make You Beautiful", in which she does her impression of a make-up artist who must have taken lessons from Madge the manicurist.

Wanda Cannon also does a nice novelty piece in the show. Her lover has run off to Bermuda and she is stuck doing the Sunday Times puzzle by herself. "Crossword Puzzle" is the only chance Wanda gets to show what she can really do, given the proper material.

At one point, the girls do a fifties-style vocal chorus with high-pitched teenage voices, their bodies swaying in unison. That part is done with gusto and flair as compared to the lulling nature of most of the revue.

Brian McKay is overshadowed by his two outgoing co-stars. He certainly has a fine singing voice but again, he isn't given much to sing about. The musical efforts of David Shire are entirely forgettable in this case (even though Barbra Streisand has recorded some of the songs).

The three occasionally sing in three-part harmony during the show. When they do, we get some of the rare highlights in the evening.

The choreography is cramped by the small cabaret stage. It is a credit to the performers that they manage to do a vintage top hat, baton and white gloves routine in the space provided.

Overall, it seems that the revue has limited appeal for students who are trying to decide how to spend a meagre living stipend. A comment made by one student after the show sums it up: "This is where you take your girlfriend's parents."

A State of Blood: An inside look at the sanguinary Amin regime

A State of Blood
by Henry Kyemba
Ace Books, $2.50
Paperback

When Wanume Kibedi, Uganda's former Foreign Minister and Idi Amin's brother-in-law, went into exile, many Ugandans were of the opinion that he had waited too long—that his hands were stained too thoroughly for them to wash clean. Stories were told, in Kampala and in the exile community in Nairobi, of his alleged involvement in some of the more sordid and deadly activities of Amin's government. It was considered that he was a marked man; one who would never be welcome in a post-Amin Uganda. Kibedi defected early in 1973.

From that, the reader can perhaps imagine how Ugandans feel about the 'escape' of Henry Kyemba in mid-1977.

Kyemba is one of that small 'generation' of Africans who completed their university education just at the time when a rapid and mammoth expansion was taking place in their country's civil service. He went from his hall of residence at Makerere University College directly to a job as assistant Secretary in the Office of the Prime Minister. In the British-designed structure of Uganda's civil service, that's one step from the top.

Since then, 1963, Henry Kyemba has never been far from the apex of power. By his own account, he made the transition from former prime minister Obote's government to Amin's very smoothly. That move forms the base for many stories about Kyemba which are, at the very least, libelous. It is perhaps interesting that a good many of these stories come not from Obote supporters but from members of the Baganda tribe, who were in the forefront of the cheering section for Amin's rise to power. In the past few years Kyemba has come to be one of the most despised (in the narrower sense that involves looking down at someone) men in Uganda.

Like John Dean, Henry Kyemba is a bit of a weasel. Clever, cowardly and vicious; not the sort of man you'd like to have your back exposed to. Such, at least, is the 'street wisdom' about him in Uganda. I heard it before Amin came to power, and more often during the past four years. I doubt very much whether Kyemba's defection and the subsequent publication of his A State of Blood will revise that opinion.

Nonetheless, it must be said that few people are in a better position to tell the inside story of Amin's Uganda. Like John Dean, Kyemba was part of the inner circle: the power elite. He is seldom forced to take refuge in rumour, he was there. And when he decides to blow the gaff, he has plenty of it to blow.

All the events that have captured headlines in the outside world are there. The expulsion of the Asians, the murders of countless thousands of Ugandans, the dismembering of the Uganda economy, Amin's sexual prowess, his taste for human flesh and the murder of Dora Bloch. Yes, S &

M freaks will really get off on this one. And it's all (well, let's be conservative and say 98 percent) true.

But having waded through all the atrocities—and that word has real meaning in the Uganda context—one is left to wonder: what took Kyemba so long before he left Uganda and decided to tell all? The simple answer must be that he could live with it so long as he personally felt safe. He reveals that it was with the deaths of Archbishop Lwum and Messrs Oryema and Oboto-Ofumbi that Kyemba realized that he could well be next. So he packed his bags. That was quite sensible, but others might be more sensitive to it if he had done so years before.

A State of Blood is not a great book. It documents events without relating them. There is narrative, but little or no analysis. In a sense it is typical of the sort of journalism on Amin and Uganda with which we are all familiar. Suspicious university people note: the journalists' sins in the telling of the Uganda story have been those of omission rather than commission; that is, they have not been lying to you, they just haven't told you all of the truth. And, that truth, if anything, is far worse than what you read in the Toronto Star. The difference between Henry Kyemba and Gerald Utting is that

All Hail the brave conqueror of Dora Bloch.

Kyemba knows what he's talking about. So there's less bullshit.

It's very pleasant that A State of Blood is a paperback. At $2.50, it's not a bad buy. But anyone who has read the Playboy interview with Kyemba, or seen him on the CBC or CBS, or read the excerpts in the Toronto papers has been exposed to the book's high points, and can safely leave it on the shelf. Ugandaphiles on the other hand will 'need' to buy; for there is a wealth of little details that fill gaps, a good many anecdotes that help put other information in context. Serious students of 'third world' affairs will have to go and beg off-prints from John Saul in the Political Science Department.

Witty Repartee

A conversation piece is an eighteenth century English family portrait — the kind where, if you ask what on earth the man is doing with his family in a cornfield, the answer is that he's owning them. . . . In Luchino Visconti's new film, Conversation Piece, the Professor devotes his retirement to collecting such paintings. Conversation pieces make up his own invented family, one which happily exerts no human demands. They compensate for the world from which he has secluded himself, with which as he explains, he has little in common.

His seclusion does not last. Another family of sorts, real this time and riven with modern tensions, invades his privacy by inducing him to let the apartment above. His elaborate reserve is powerless before the offensiveness of these people — the Countess Bianca Brumonti (played with basilisk brilliance by Silvano Mangano), her teenage daughter and stepson, who are lovers, and her own lover — and theirs — Konrad (Helmut Berger, another Visconti favourite). The Professor (Burt Lancaster) is both repelled and fascinated by this noisome piece of incest on his doorstep and within it. Now view on . . .

The action develops entirely within the confines of the two apartments and the staircase in between. Visconti has always used the family as a touchstone of social normality, and in this film he reduces the theme to chamber-opera proportions. Nevertheless, it is as if, taking his cue from Mahler (who was, you'll remember, the hero of Visconti's version of Death in Venice he uses a full orchestra to get his chamber effects. Rich umber colours imitate the paintings hung around the walls, and a wide, wide screen often presents simply close-ups. The sound too is opulent; a Strauss somewhere between Salome and Rosenkavalier.

Chamber opera? Perhaps closet-opera hits nearer the mark. For Konrad's appeal — for Visconti, for the audience, for our Professor — is undeniably homosexual. We are left wondering just what the Professor's human interest is. But apart from that tease in the narrative there is the question as to what the intruders represent in the Professor's world (and Visconti's — they begin to merge). Although there is much argument, in every way, the question remains open. Clearly these people conflict with Visconti's own Proust-Mahler-Mann sensibility; but one can't always be sensible. And the Professor says at one point that intellectuals of his generation tried to join politics and morality — a hopeless search, from which he has retreated, rightly or wrongly. So there appears a moral and political gulf between generations. Take politics first.

Here Konrad is the conundrum, especially when Visconti contrasts (compares?) him to a refugee Resistance fighter. We are told Konrad was an activist in Berlin in '68; but his radicalism then and now would seem merely to mix nostalgia for aristocratic standards with hatred for the capitalist rich. My guess is that he stands for the necessary perversion of virtue in a world where everything is camouflaged and distorted by capitalism. But he may simply stand for perversion.

As for the others, let us say they represent moral decadence — the new bourgeois aristocracy. It's difficult to decide what they mean to or for the Professor, though he begins to love them (as people? as decadents?). They amount to a judgement on his detachment from humanity. Yet there is more, for when Lietta (the daughter) flaunts 'Auden's last poem' at him ('When you see a fair form, chase it. And if possible embrace it. Be it a girl or a boy . . .') it is implied (or is it?)

that this Aschenbach would be quite right to fall for his Tadzio.

Conversation piece? Family imbroglios, a foiled political coup, an auto-da-fe in the end provide more than a topic of conversation for the Professor: they occasion his repentance.

All told, an awkward but enthralling film, so ambiguous as to leave us in doubt what is ambiguous. Are these Visconti's double-edged last thoughts? As perhaps the greatest of the Neo-realists Visconti had wished to portray people caught up in the web of society. But the modern world was too jumbled, too unaesthetic for Visconti's tastes. He was a true aristocrat, who became a Marxist. The Bible asks, can the leopard change his spots? Visconti and his alter ego the Professor do not change theirs. Yet Conversation Piece makes clear if nothing else the futility of a noble rejection of even the most degraded of worlds.

Beauty & the Beast

Finally, Cocteau's 1945 masterwork La Belle et La Bête arrives in Toronto. Notable as much for its iconographic photography as for Cocteau's melding of the fabulous, the film captures the essence of the fairy tale, almost. And the Beast is real cute, much better than the Prince, which is a dog's name anyway.

Mammaries make movie

"London is a bad place," says Joseph Andrews at the outset of the Henry Fielding novel which bears his name. He is lamenting the temptations and dangers which lurk for the innocent in that great evil city. The novel is largely concerned with the contrast of city and country and the extent to which their seeming opposition is illusory. It is possibly the most humane work of satire to appear in English in the eighteenth century and it is no less scathing for that.

Tom Jones is another question. It is the work of a writer in despair which bears more resemblance to Waiting for Godot than those who know only Tony Richardson's film of the novel would be likely to credit. Richardson's film concentrated only on the surface gaiety, on the ways to bide the time while the world caves in. And it worked; Those qualities which Richardson sought in Fielding's work (vigour, energy, humour) were easily translated to the screen as they were present in the original. The film may have omitted all that was central to the novel but there was no tampering.

Richardson's second attempt at a Fielding novel, Joseph Andrews, cannot claim as much. It is treated very much as a sequel, with the hand of a man who has been unsuccessful in other areas forced back to what his producers have told him he can do.

Unfortunately there is very little relation between the two novels, and any attempt to force Joseph Andrews into the mould of Tom Jones has to distort the tale almost beyond recognition. This would not be an entirely bad thing if the filmmakers had decided to employ only the setting and the general outline of the plot. Hell, you could make a great Errol Flynn movie from that starting point.

Richardson, however, follows the novel. All of the episodes which have action in them are there on the screen, one capture and escape after another to the point where the audience is certain that several trees are about to uproot themselves and dash across the countryside chasing Joseph and his sweetie. Most of the less rampaging scenes have been omitted or changed for reasons which leave this viewer's fingernails embedded in his scalp. Why has the curious squire been turned into an outtake from 120 Days of Sodom? Why does Parson Adams oration in praise of stoicism become a diatribe on the evils of fornication? Why does the Pedlar sing such a boring story? . . .

The plot is still there but the intent has been changed. Into what the inquisitive reader might ask? Brian says, dunno, I just dunno.

Perhaps it's just good, clean, lusty fun in the olde English manner, but there's too much of the man-at-the-bar's elbow in your ribs nudge-nudge but aren't we being naughty for me. Perhaps it's just a vehicle for Ann-Margret's (as Lady Booby) mammaries before silicon droop sets in. Maybe all those naked men running around will delight the young women in the audience and have them longing for time warp. Maybe if I hadn't read the book . . .

The film still tastes sour. It's unbalanced, unfocused, irregularly paced, neither fish nor fowl . . . On the other hand I can't wait to see what he'll do with Amelia.

Concert Productions Int.: The money of making art

Concert Productions International got its start in 1973 when Bill Ballard, Harold Ballard's son and then vice-president of Maple Leaf Gardens, decided that the current rock show promotion in the Gardens was both inadequate and inefficient. Looking around, he settled on a partnership with one of the several existing rock promoters, Cimba Productions, run by Michael Cohl and David Wolinsky. Cohl and Wolinsky had the expertise and Ballard had the Gardens. With exclusive rights to one of the biggest halls in Canada, the newly formed C.P.I. soon ran the concert scene in Toronto.

The other concert promoters in the city, such as Martin Orno's Encore Productions, were strangled because of their inability to get into the Gardens. Ballard's pull ensured that C.P.I. also got the first shot at places like the C.N.E. The only real rival to C.P.I. left in the city is the comparatively small Finkelstein and Music Arts Productions. They run folk concerts in some of the smaller halls. Concerts billed as CHUM FM or Q107 Presents are all C.P.I. shows. The radio stations have been quick to form an alliance with the C.P.I. folks.

C.P.I.'s booking of concerts is done on a remarkably informal basis. They are in constant touch with rock agents throughout Canada and the United States and thus have first crack at all the major shows. The agents, of course, realize that they have the only access to the Gardens and therefore tend to ignore the smaller promotion companies. Even the agents of smaller name groups tend towards C.P.I. on the hopes that their bands may one day need the Gardens.

Once a concert is booked, the members of Cheap Thrills, the C.P.I. concert club, get first shot at the tickets. The members of this club (membership fee is 35 dollars a year) are guaranteed a specific seat for all C.P.I. shows. The club has a membership of 2,500, and thus drastically reduces the number of seats available to the casual concert goer. Cheap Thrills was initiated, according to Michael Cohl, to eliminate scalping. Funniest goddam thing about that but wouldn't a 'strict two ticket per person limit work just as well? And, for some strange reason, tickets are still being scalped.

Casual Concert-goers Lose Out

The remaining tickets are then distributed to the various ticket agencies around the city. Each agent will get, say, 200 tickets of which only a dozen will be any good. Thus, unless you're one of the first couple of people in one of those marathon all-night line-ups, your chances of getting a good seat are practically nil. Then, to add insult to injury, if the show is cancelled, you get the price of the ticket back but not the seventy odd cents handling charge. A ticket agent can, theoretically, make several thousand dollars on a cancelled show. And guess who's paying? Finally, if you buy a ticket to the Thin Lizzy show to see the opening band The Rumour (and why else would anyone go to a Thin Lizzy show?) and The Rumour cancels, you can't get a refund on your ticket. Charming, isn't it?

As for ticket sales announcements, they're made on CHUM and through the newspapers. Unfortunately, these announcements tend to be of the 'tickets are on sale today' variety so that fans who don't have some personal access to ticket sales news are usually left put in the cold or, at best, at the end of huge line-ups. The most deplorable type of ticket announcement follows the example of that used for last year's Wings concert. It was announced on CHUM, at noon on a week day, that tickets would be on sale as of that moment. Anyone who missed the announcement or just happened not to have twenty dollars on him, was out of luck. When asked whether this practice would be used in the future Michael Cohl replied, "Definitely. It prevents damage to stores and avoids kids being frustrated by long line-ups."

Within a month, if everything goes according to plan, C.P.I. will be installing the Ticketron system (to be called BAS, "Best available seats" here) in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver. Despite its dubious success in the States, Cohl and his associates believe it has definite advantages to offer the ticket buyer in Canada. What will happen is this: C.P.I. has already made an agreement with the Info-centre people (they run those kiosks in major shopping centres) and most of the old ticket agencies to install the BAS terminals. A central computer distributes tickets to all the terminals simultaneously so that, when you buy a ticket from a given terminal, you are not getting the best ticket available at that particular outlet, but the best ticket available to anyone in the city. Everyone has the same chance for the same tickets.

CPI Goons Uncontrolled

The BAS system's advantages are obvious, but it is hardly the Godsend that C.P.I. would have us believe. The Cheap Thrills people still get to pick out the seats before they even reach the computer. The new system does nothing to eliminate monster line-ups or tricky sales announcements. And, in theory, if a terminal breaks down or one kiosk opens a few minutes before the rest or even if the person operating the terminal is not as fast as he could be, the distribution of good seats will be widely upset. Finally, it is not clear whether or not it is the computer which decides which seat is the next best in line. If it is, there is bound to be trouble; people's opinions as to what is a good seat vary considerably.

The question of violence brings us to the topic of C.P.I. security. Although C.P.I.'s security men at last week's Iggy Pop concert handled a very rowdy crowd with remarkable and admirable tact, on the other hand, the much lambasted Marley concert and last year's Aerosmith show were the scenes of several vicious incidents. The problem seems to be one of control. Although the security people are hired on a regular basis, Michael Cohl was unable to explain exactly whose authority they are under at a concert. One would think that these gentlemen would be under the direct supervision of someone trained in crowd control. Apparently not. Outbreaks of violence, then, are bound to re-occur. A bouncer who is not responsible to anyone, cannot be expected to be all that responsible.

When confronted with criticisms of mismanagement and inconsideration in the past, C.P.I.'s rallying cry has always been, "We may not be perfect, but who can do any better?" The answer is simply, no one else. That's business, you say? Fine. But monopolies owe a special consideration to their customer, and C.P.I. is a monopoly of the first order. Any company which grosses over 6 million dollars a year and still treats its captive clientele like cattle is guilty of being more than especially avaricious. Their greed has made them stupid and arrogant in their inconsideration. A few thousand well-spent dollars can go a long way in public relations.

But then again, in the words of a former employer of mine, "I only see the bottom line, Boy."

Muir: manure as social saboteur

Frank Muir was, until recently, half of one of England's finest comedy writing teams, along with Dennis Norden. Together they wrote the radio comedy series Take It From Here and were also the chief participants in two long-running gameshows which continue in syndicated rerun, My Lord and My Music. The main feature of My Word was the elaborate story each of them would invent at the close of the program, based on a popular saying each had been given at the beginning of the show. An outrageous pun based on the phrase would cap each story. For example:

Frank Muir was given the phrase: "It's better to have loved and lost, than never to have loved at all." He concluded a long, thoroughly absurd story about a classmate named Hoyle saying: "That's the whole story, and actually I can't work the phrase in. It just seemed to me that it would be nice to tell this amusing story, and let Dennis Norden win, because, finally, it's not the winning that's important, is it? There's a certain value to a nice funny story at which we were all able to laugh, even if it doesn't win, because as everybody knows, 'It's better to have laughed, and lost, than never to have laughed at Hoyle.'"

That sort of thing. They were a very funny team, but they split up (very amicably) in 1970. Dennis Norden to write film scripts, Frank Muir to write books, each on their own.

The Frank Muir Book, subtitled An Irreverent Companion to Social History, is a look at Ancient, Medieval and Modern history as represented by the statements of people who were right pissed off and blind up the wall about what was happening. As such, it could be a valuable addition to oral history, for as Frank Muir remarks in his introduction: "An irreverent reaction is not only more fun to read than one of somber respectfulness but it is quite likely to be a more honest and true reaction."

The book doesn't do very much with the premise however. Apart from one or two very sharp remarks (as Voltaire's "The only reward to be expected from the cultivation of literature is contempt if one fails and envy if one succeeds") and a number which are singularly obtuse (such as a minor critic of music's remark that he thought music had reached its lowest ebb in the pop songs of Champagne Charlie — until he attended an opera of Richard Wagner), the quotations and references are without any punch. Far from quoting from the serious and profound sources of disaffection to be found in the sayings and writings of major figures in literature, arts or politics, he selects mostly statements of mild irritation, and ignores almost entirely the most serious and profound writers and thinkers in this line. Rabelais never appears, not even to make his magnificent death-bed speech: "I go to seek a great perhaps. Ring down the curtain, the farce is over." Swift is quoted exactly four times, in trivial contexts, once as one of a number of authorities to attest that beans cause posterior wind; as if we needed the fierce, nobly denunciatory voice of Swift to establish that.

The work fails, then, I think, as anything but a work to which one can return with amusement indeed in many an idle hour, but with no true enlightenment at last as to the social history of irreverence, or the importance of rage as a spur to writing, thought, or action to alter the world.

Tones trash, Poles pompous; Night of Living Dead Boys

Last Friday and Saturday, the New Yorker held host to three punk rock bands: Toronto's Viletones and the Poles, and the headliners from Cleveland, the Dead Boys. The Friday show was scheduled to start at midnight but at 12:30 a.m. the crowd was still milling restlessly outside.

Every once in a while, the Viletones have a special evening, but Friday was not one of them. A passive crowd and total apathy on the part of the band led to a dull and boring set, that was the longest of the evening. At the end of all of this, they still came back for an encore for no apparent reason.

The Viletones' set contained one of the evening's lowpoints as Natsee Dog spotted a beefy girl cavorting in front of the stage. Unzipping his pants, he strutted up there and sang while she stuffed her hand down his crotch. It was pitiful.

Next came the Poles. They showed promise as the musicians tried to tune their instruments before the show. Michael Berman, the kinky female vocalist, stomped on stage and I immediately fell in love. She looked like a nineteenth century whore in black ankle high boots, sheer stockings, tight hot pants, and a black garbage bag top.

Unfortunately the band is one of the worst I've ever heard. Doig Pringle's keyboards were for the most part inaudible and the rest of the band was uniformly dull. Michael Berman may be cute but on stage she's horribly wooden; in between songs she spouted childish verse and sounded like a third-rate Patti Smith.

At about 3:30 a.m., the five piece Dead Boys came on stage. The Cleveland band is made up by Stiv Bators (vocals), Johnny Blitz (drums), Jeff Magnum (bass), and Jimmy Zero and Cheetah Chrome (guitars). Even though they played at deafening volume, it was soon evident that they were musically far superior to the bands who had already played. There is a definite art to performing 'good punk' (witness the Ramones).

Stiv Bators looks like he suffered from polio as a child and on stage he comes across as being both warped and deranged.

All the Dead Boys songs sound the same, but then so do Mozart's. After a set that lasted only thirty-five minutes, they left the stage. As usual there was no audience reaction, probably because everyone had left, but the boys returned anyway. I moved up beside a third row cutie as Stiv Bators danced wearing a red plastic shirt, the type hospitals use to identify unknown emergency casualties.

Finally at 4 a.m. the show ended and I stumbled out, humming "I want to be a dead boy". It was a disappointing show, livened only by the brief appearance of the pros from Cleveland. At the end of it all, I felt like a zombie and my ears hurt, but I wouldn't have missed it for the world. Who needs Peter Frampton when you can see Stiv Bators? Maybe as Dead Boy Jimmy Zero says: "We're all ambulance chasers at heart. People who like to see car wrecks".

Infill on TO backlanes

Jersey Street is narrow for a city street. It runs north off Harbord just east of Grace Street; halfway to Bloor it turns abruptly right and ends at Clinton, the next street over. The houses on the east side are very small: two and a half stories tall and most are only twelve and a half feet wide. The houses stand very close to the street with barely enough setback for the steps and porch; in the summer the remaining area is filled with brilliantly-coloured flowers. Across the street are the ramshackle garages and fences of the larger houses on Grace Street. When it's nice out you can barely drive a car down the street for the kids, parents, dogs, bicycles et al. It is an amazing place: it is half street and half lane.

Backlanes, perhaps, are one of the very few places in Toronto where people and cars get along on an equal footing. First, they are not direct thoroughfares (with some exceptions); while one could, if one tried very hard, drive from Bloor to Queen, west of Bathurst, along the lanes, one wouldn't because the route is slow, congested and confused. Second, the lanes provide an amount of parking, but also have enough room that one can change an engine. Third, lanes often serve as secondary routes for pedestrians; you can go to the supermarket at the head of the street and cut between buildings onto the lane and down to your back doors, which you left unlocked because you would be back momentarily. Fourth, there's the immense issue of children's play. Lanes are incredible playgrounds for children; while never that far away from home, they are very separate and somewhat hidden. They provide a kind of play that the open, public parks cannot give, no matter how adventuresome their playgrounds may be.

There are a number of projects in various stages of planning or completion involving backlanes around the city. Two in particular are the Dundas-Sherbourne Development which was completed several months ago, and the Hydro Block, an area bounded by Beverly, Cecil, Henry and Baldwin, which is nearing completion now.

Diamond and Meyers (York Square, Innis College) were initially the architects of both schemes, but on the dissolution of their partnership Barton Meyers took Dundas-Sherbourne and Jack Diamond the Hydro Block.

Dundas-Sherbourne presents an extremely small site consisting of most of the west half of the Dundas-Sherbourne-Gerrard-Ontario block: the eastern edge is the lane running south from Gerrard. It was built more or less in the backyards of existing houses on Sherbourne. Two major problems exist in the project. The new six and seven storey structure vastly overshadows the old houses, but this is secondary to the question at hand. Most of the access to the new building is from Sherbourne; almost all the front doors of the family apartments face the back doors and tiny backyards of existing houses. The space is peculiar and uncomfortable; it is the way to the front doors and yards of the new first floor apartments yet you seem to be standing in someone's back yard amongst their laundry.

There are a few units on the north end of the building whose yards are oriented towards the laneway and the difference is quite remarkable. That side is much less nervous and much more outward looking. One is able to view the lane as a small, quiet public street. It is not hard to imagine a similar infill project happening on the other side of the lane, (hopefully not as dense), now garages and sheds, making it a rather remarkable street.

The Hydro Block uses its site quite differently. The houses on Beverly were renovated while the east side of the site was cleared. The new building follows the original building lines along Baldwin, Henry and Cecil forming a courtyard space behind the structure. Here the laneway has been closed and incorporated, along with most of the backyards of the existing houses, into the courtyard area. The mistake is fairly self-evident: the area is isolated, neither open to all like a lane, nor confined to a few like a backyard. Intended to be communal park and playground, the space is dominated by the new building. It faces a great number of apartments onto the court and will seriously undermine the anonymity a public space needs to live. It also destroys the possibility of the kind of clandestine play that happens with kids on a backlane like the one which used to exist on the site.

Toronto has a relatively lengthy history of back lane development; Cabbagetown, Kensington, Queen and Markham, College and Huron, to name a few, all have small areas on lanes where, at some point prior to the invention of modern urban planning, individuals have subdivided land and developed it as tiny, often owner-built homes. They are very special places, some of them; often they understand what it means to front on a lane much better than our new over-arched developments. It seems that building in lanes will appear as a major component of residential development downtown in future. And Toronto provides amazing number of excellent precedents for the use and re-use of lanes. One can only hope they find employment.

Orford thinks, Purcell sinks

Last Sunday at Walter Hall the Orford String Quartet played the fourth instalment of their six-concert Beethoven cycle. It was the best afternoon so far by any standard. The Orford's balance, control, and intellect are no secrets, but Sunday's concert displayed style, depth, and a full sound sometimes missing last Spring.

The distinctive opening theme of Op. 18, No. 1 was taken rather lightly by the Quartet, almost glibly; but they incorporated with this approach to the first movement a subtlety and grace that struck me as quite unique. The Adagio, one of the most remarkable slow movements in "early period" Beethoven, had much beautiful playing, especially from violist Terence Helmer.

The Scherzo and final Allegro were taken too freely to be really satisfying. Both movements suffered from an unsteady rhythmic pulse and poorly considered accelerandos. Balance was nevertheless faultless throughout the performance — it was as if the Orford instruments could not be made to play too loudly.

The Orford strategy in the complex and toilsome Great Fugue was to curb the power and compensate with other methods of communication. It was a good idea. Well-defined phrases gave their interpretation comprehensibility, and crisp rhythmic patterns gave it energy.

The Quartet in F. Op. 59, No. 1 is remarkable for its spaciousness, variety, and workmanship and the Orford scored successes throughout. Cellist St. Cyr's statement of the opening theme was a little obvious, but the Allegro was otherwise very well played, especially the breathtakingly quiet fugal section of the development.

In the scherzando movement, St. Cyr and Helmer played the beginning rhythmic figures with admirable directness and inflexibility — an effect much superior to the tenuto garbage some quartets slop over these bars. The Orford's quick reading of the following Adagio (easily justified by the simple form and materials) was superbly phrased, and the "Theme Russe" finale had vigour, warmth, and pace. Truly first-class Beethoven.

That same evening at Hart House the Purcell Quartet made a gallant attempt to rescue a program of music from a flood of reflected sound. The Great Hall does to string ensembles what the Heisenberg uncertainty principle did to our understanding of the location of elementary particles.

One can speak of a viola entry only in terms of a field of probability; in the Great Hall, the concept of notes simultaneously played has no meaning.

Consequently, there is little to be said about how the Purcell plays music. Runs of detached notes sounded like the most languid glissandi, and phrasing was classified information. Balance was decidedly cello-heavy from my seat, and intonation slips (real or apparent) were stunning.

The Haydn "Lark" and Dvorak Op. 105 Quartets were the major items on the program. The forthright Purcell approach was well-suited to Dvorak, but sometimes out of sympathy with the balance and irony of Haydn. The remainder of the program consisted of two impressionistic, and very fine, Ernest MacMillan Sketches for String Quartet and some less interesting numbers by Eugene Goossens and Percy Grainger.

Many of the world's most famous vaulted interiors are acoustic disasters. Listenable solo piano recitals sometimes happen in the Great Hall, but a group of musicians is always a washout.

Arthur Kaptainis

Symphony back-up best play quickly, and well; the serenity and dignity inherent in the music, seemed forgotten. The first movement, which is more anguish than serenity, and the lyrical Andante were far more successful.

I suppose I'm implying the sort of thing I feel like saying to the student drama groups (Hart House?) that manage to mount Shakespeare, at great labour, but only start the Bard rolling in his grave. Brahms wasn't rolling, assuredly, but the effort of preparing this performance seems to be for naught. Whether because of Feldbrill's directions, or the limitations of the orchestra's technique (less likely), it did not at all do the composer justice, despite good execution, notably by the brass section.

While the Tchaikovsky was no mere pedagogical exercise, the students did seem to get more out of it than the Brahms, if excellent and committed performances are anything to go by.

The Centre is staffed to provide prompt and efficient assistance to anyone seeking information. Copies of any reference material may be made at modest charge. Hand-out brochures of a non-technical nature are also available. The Centre, which includes a comfortable study area, is an extension of Ontario Hydro's activities to encourage public involvement.

Awright!! The big news of the week is that the immortal Harry Belafonte will tally his bananas at Massey Hall on Nov. 10th. Tickets for that cultural feast, which include supper, are $75. A small price to pay for art.

Meanwhile, back in the land of sane, Eddy and the Hot Rods, a harmless British punk band with a distinctly Who-like sound, will be playing the Masonic Temple on the 30th. The opening act will be Hamilton's own Teenage Head.

The New Yorker is really packing in the loonies, with what the Vibrators on the 4th and 5th of Nov, and Stomu Yamashta's "Go" on the 28th and 29th of this month. The only act that compares with them for madcap, zany antics is the Good Brothers, who'll bring their own brand of hilarity to Con. Hall on the 18th.

In the for-fanatics-only department, Phoebe Snow will be at Con Hall this Coming Thursday and Grateful Dead will be at Seneca Fieldhouse (a horrid place for a concert) on Nov. 2nd. The master of pop sludge, Mr. Peter Allen, will at Massey Hall on the 10th of Nov.

Around the clubs, we have the subtle lyricism of Sledge at the Tube, the intricate rhythms of Wireless at the Gasworks, and the rich textures of Cueballs at the Horseshoe. The Dutch Mason Blues Band are at the Chimney tonight and Brand X is at the El Mocambo. Domenic Troiano's gig at Massey was cancelled, so he'll be doing the Colonial tonight.

For you folkies (chuckle), William P. Bennett, who has just brought out a new album, is at the Nervous Break-down Cafe and Ian Tamblyn is at the Riverboat. The Majestics, who might as well be folkies, are at Dr. John's (U.C. Refectory) tonight.

Steak on a Bun is not planning a Toronto gig in the immediate future. Neither is Kims.

Berg's Wozzeck (in English) opens tonight at the OK Centre. Further 8:15 stagings Tuesday and Thursday; Sunday mat at 2:00. The CCMC—a "free improvisational orchestra"—performs tonight at 9:00, 30 St. Patrick St., $2. At St. Lawrence Town Hall, a first-rate assemblage including Barry Tuckwell, Maureen Forrester, and Yo-Yo Ma perform Brahms's Horn Trio, Cello Sonatas, and Two Songs for Alto and Viola. Starts 8:00; tickets $5.50 and $6.50.

Also tonight, the Festival Slogers open their season with the Saunders Requiem, and items by Bach and Clifford Ford. The Toronto Dance Theatre will carry on during the Faure to keep you interested. Repeat performance Saturday; both 8:30 in Metropolitan United Church. Starts 54.

Tomorrow at 8:30, a much changed Chamber Players ensemble starts the season with a Dvorak-Elgar-Grieg program. Walter Hall, students $4. The TSO pops concerts this weekend look pretty substantial — Dvorak Cello Concerto with Daniel Domb. Massey Hall tomorrow at 7:30, Sunday at 3:00. Some $5 fix remain.

The Boston Chamber Players are at St. Lawrence Town Hall Sunday at 8:00. Brahms program includes Clarinet Quintet; tickets $5.50 and $6.50.

Pianist Garrick Ohlsson plays the Chopin F minor concerto with the TSO this week. Massey Hall, Tuesday and Wednesday at 8:30; rush seats at 7:00. Tuesday at Parkdale Library, a free concert of modern and traditional Ukrainian music. Starts 7:30.

Wednesday at 8:00 in Deer Park United Church, German organist Werner Jacob gives a free recital (Bach-Pachelbel-Reger). Thursday's Town Hall Brahms program includes the Piano Quintet played by the Orford Quartet and Patricia Parr. 8:00; tickets $5.50 and $6.50.

art

In step with Queen Elizabeth's Canadian visit is a photographic exhibition of 200 facsimile prints of Victorian England and the Empire. It features a photo of The Rosetts by Lewis Carroll and Philip Delamotte's Crystal Palace and will continue at Scarborough College's The Meeting Place Gallery till November 30. Our own Victoria College has a show called "In Memoriam Clean Air" by Toronto artist Pat Parkinson whose recent show "These Prints May Disturb You" disturbed a number of viewers. A multi-media exploration of pollution. Till November 10 in the New Academic Building.

Joe Rosenblatt's recent drawings in a show called "Snake Oil" at the Gadatsy Gallery are designed to laugh at society's decadents and coddle the innocents. These snake fantasies will hang till November 4. Catch it. The opening of the Wildlife Gallery on Birch Avenue takes a more serious outlook on the flora and fauna. Its special exhibition of rare turn-of-the-century decorative art by Anton Seder includes some unusual lithographs. Till Nov. 1.

The Roberts Gallery has an exhibition of recent paintings by pop realist Charles Comfort while at the Isaac's Gallery up the street on Yonge, Eldon Gamet's show, Blurs, has realism by the balls. The Isaac's also has some Montreal imports from five artists who usually show at Montreal's Gheerbrant Gallery. Will Boogaerts, Hovrat, Palumbo, Vazan, and Vlinder vote for the referendum in Quebec? The Isaacs show till October 28, the Roberts show till Oct. 29.

Patrick Landale's recent paintings and drawings at the Merton Gallery till October 29 and Robert Good-nough's recent works at the David Mirvish Gallery till Nov. 1 are interesting but lack freshness.

Most fun this week are Tom Adams' paintings at David Mirvish. He's a well-known illustrator for paperback covers of books by John Fowles, Raymond Chandler, and Agatha Christie, quoted as having sung "I want to be a paperback writer", he's the next best thing to it. Thirty full-size acrylic framed Adams' paintings for Agatha Christie novel covers will be for sale on and show. Again autograph hounds can ogle the artist tomorrow between noon and 3 p.m. and Sunday same time. This exhibition combines with the launch of Christie's last book "Sleeping Murder," and will include a silent auction on the painting from that book. Till Nov. 26.

George Hawken is concerned with figures and portraits in his new show of etchings, engravings, paintings, and drypoint at the Aggregation Gallery till Nov. 10. Chalm Gross's small bronzes and drawings at the Prince Arthur Galleries till Nov. 8. Dubuffet, whom I believe to be a French 'automatist', has an amazing selection of collages, figurative paintings, and sculpture at the Albert White Gallery till Nov. 2.

Rita Letendre has a one-woman show at the Gallery Moos. A high calibre show and continuing till Nov. 3.

The AGO opens a spectacular new exhibition tomorrow on the Impresario — Ambroise Vollard. Vollard was the all-round impresario of the Paris art world in the early 20th century and the foremost art dealer and publisher of prints and illustrated books in France at that time. Included are Cezanne's Les Baigneurs, Munch's Le Soir, and Renoir's Le Chapeau Epingle. Till December 4.

jazz

Hello Jazz Fans! I'd like to make two corrections that have been brought to my attention concerning my recent jazz article. I omitted to mention CRT FM 91.1, which features the Jazz Scene with Ted O'Reilly Monday to Friday 10 p.m.-1 a.m. and Saturday 6 a.m.-noon and 7 p.m.-10 p.m. Also, I inexplicably forgot to include Wing Jazz Records, at 288 Queen St. W. Thanks to Jim Ballinger for the reminder.

Now back to live jazz: Peewee Irwin blows his trumpet at DJ's Tavern until Saturday, followed next week by Ed Hubble on trombone. Both men date from the early Swing era. No cover at this club on Monday and Tuesday; otherwise, $2.

Pete Magadini (drums) and Rick Wilkins (tenor) bring their group to Yellowfingers on Monday. Wilkins' playing unfortunately lacks vitality. The Jane Fair Quartet (reeds & flute) sits in after hours tonight and tomorrow. On both tenor and soprano Jane is exciting, although her flute work doesn't quite make it. She plays primarily modern jazz, but can really swing when she wants to. On Sunday, the Steve Lederer Quartet (tenor). Does anyone who reads this column ever attend the Sunday concerts?

~ BIC's Coffee House continues to feature the George Botley Organ Trio, Tues.-Thurs. 9-12 p.m. 11 Yorkville, 923-2943.

The CCMC perform their collective improvisations every Tuesday and Friday evenings at the Music Gallery, 30 Patrick St. 598-2400.

George's presents Guido Basso (trumpet) this week, followed next week by the Bruce Cassidy Quartet (trumpet). This writer is unable to enjoy Cassidy's solo work, but perhaps a more sophisticated ear can appreciate his musicality.

Frank Rosolino brings his fine trombone playing to Bourbon St. until Oct. 29, backed up by the trio of Ed Bickert, Don Thompson and Jerry Fuller. Frank also signs, and if the selections that Ted O'Reilly recently aired on CRT are any indication, he should be quite entertaining. Trombones are nice on ballads, and he's dextrous enough to do be-bop as well.

Cafe Soho, at 334 Queen W., offers after hours jazz as usual Thursday through Saturday nights. This club provides the least commercialized atmosphere of any in town, and consequently allows the musicians more freedom for their creative processes. Tonight and Saturday feature the Bob Brough Quartet (sax), with the Rob Carroll Quartet (guitar) coming in on Thursday, Oct. 27. 862-0149.

Tonight, tomorrow and Sunday at 8:30 p.m. provide an opportunity to watch Canada's smallest dance company perform. Tourneol, which is really Carole and Ernst Eder, presents "Separation" at the Ballet Y Studio. Separation is the work of John Juliani and blends theatre and dance in an exploration of the states of being alone and united. 366 Adelaide St. East; $3 admission. Info: 364-3428.

Classical Indian dancer Menaka Thakkar and four acclaimed Indian musicians transform the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall into an Indian temple tomorrow night. Thakkar performs her specialties: the Odissi and Bharatanatyam styles. At 8 p.m. Student tickets at 4 and 5. Box Office: 366-7723.

Next week there are few dance performances to be had but what's available could easily satiate the balletomane's appetite. It's the real thing — and again, it isn't. Tuesday and Wednesday New York's LES BALLET TROCKADERO DE MONTE CARLO are at the CNE's Queen Elizabeth Theatre across from The Better Living Building and believe me, good living it is.

TROCKADERO is a company of 10 male dancers who know the classical dance from bouree to grand jete intimately and perform same with much hilarity. Not only do they do pointe work (heavy heels aside) but concurrently parody the great prima ballerinas of the past with much affection. You may not believe your eyes. In fact, expect to be straining your vision if you go. Regardless of whether you'll want to see Trockadero a second time (their humour has its limits for some), it's an experience you're certain to never forget. The fun begins at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $9.50, $8, $6, $6.50. Dial 366-7551 for information.

movies

This week has brought to my attention the fact that most of my seven readers disagree with everything that appears here. Which only goes to show how much movie-goers know about art.

Friday: The New Yorker opens its two-week engagement of Cocoteau's La Belle et La Bette (get your cultured friends to translate it). This is not only a boon to the Toronto movie community — let's hope it becomes a regular on the circuit — but it also aids the space-crammed watsup. If you don't catch this at some time during the run you should go back to Sarnia. The Revue is also easing my burden by showing Tacchella Cousine, Cousine all the long week long. This one is sure to be a big hit with all students of incest, Truffaut-philés and truffle-eaters. Lumiere is offering A Brief Vacation and Lulu the Tool or the Working Class goes to Heaven which is a movie with a long title. The U of T Film Board has Something Completely Different and something for those of us who don't have TV's and are pinning for Two Hours of Internationally Awardwinning Commercials. And for student revolutionaries wishing to take a break from the arduous task of finding the revolutionary bourgeoisie, there's a training film at the Church Street Community Centre (519 Church St.), Pure Hell on St. Trinians.

Saturday: No change nowhere. Sunday: Well Sunday is its usual problematic self. The bars are shut and the movie houses are open and beckoning. The AGO's French series continues with Rene Clement's Forbidden Games (which may be about all those locked basketball courts in southern France, and may not). Innis has Cartoons at 2:00, a D. W. Griffith memorial, featuring his only sound film, an interview with himself, and Birth of a Nation which the Regus people have revamped with a soundtrack which approximates as closely as possible the score which Griffith had planned, at 5:00 and that famous heartwarmer The Good Earth at 8:00. Lumiere closes out the day with Welles and Tony Perkins persecuting Kafka in The Tidal and Losey's The Servant.

Monday: Tonight and tomorrow Lumiere has a first rate double bill, Renaiss' terrible but fascinating Hiroshima, Mon Amour and Bresson's brilliant but mind-numbing Au Hasard, Balthazar. The latter is the greatest movie ever made about a donkey (sorry all you Francis fans).

Tuesday: The Science Centre has last year's tawdry remake of Fitzgerald's The Last Tycoon while the rest of the city continues as it was.

Wednesday: The Science Centre is once again the sole moving point in this static world offering Lester's Help!, an instance of bright innocence being served for supper to our tough, hip, caring, and supercool generation.

Thursday: The week is winding down. The Revue has Bound for Glory with David Carradine and Pretty Boy Floyd (pack a lunch, this one's too long for those healthy delights they serve up over there). The rain is tapping on the windows. The Science Centre has Jack Nicholson losing his identity and finding Maria Schneider who's lost her shoes in Antonioni's The Passenger. The midnight breeze obscures the moon and Wayne Kramer is still in chains.

theatre

A note to the discerning, though not concerning theatre: Tuesday evening, 7-10 and Wednesday 11-4. The Friends of the Trinity College Library hold their book sale. On Tuesday, 50c admission gains you refreshments and a look at the many hundreds of cheaply priced volumes.

Lack of space forces a brief note concerning the Firehall's Absurd Person Singular at 70 Berkeley St. Ayckbourn is now as popular as Neil Simon, but his biting humour is as much British as Simon's is American: both lose when transplanted to Canada. Strong performances, but the material is too sordid to please me, the humour too undercut by despair. Call 364-4170 to reserve for last two performances tonight and Saturday at 8:30. A strong season continues as all the major theatres are now underway: at Tarragon, Strindberg's The Dream Play Tues.-Sun. at 8:30, Sunday matinee at 2:30; $3.50 students except for Saturday night $6.50; call 531-1827 for reservations or line up for the PWYC matinee at 30 Bridgman Avenue. Jack of Diamonds continues at the New Theatre, Bathurst and Lennox; in a stroke of per flackery, the proprietors declare they will refund money to anyone who doesn't laugh during the performance and I hear rumours that children under 14 will be admitted free. Interesting . . . call 364-5202, shows at 8:30, except Saturday and Sunday, when they will be at 7 and again at 10.

At Toronto Workshop, 12 Alexander Street, Salutin's Les Canadiens opened last night with The Rocket in attendance. All performances at 8:30, call 925-8640. At the St. Lawrence, Dekker's Shoemaker's Holiday is into its run Monday-Saturday at 8:00, Saturday matinee at 2:00 p.m. Call 366-7723 and sweetly enquire if there are student discounts or rush.

Wozzeck winds down Sunday at the Bathurst St. Theatre: call 535-9996; recommended. Desperados, less well recommended, at Toronto Free Theatre, Tues.-Sat. a 8:30, call for price information.

On Campus, Loot, a Joe Orton comedy, at the New Vic Theatre tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 for a mere 99 cents. Reservations at 978-3820. And Robertson Davies' new commissioned play Pontiac and the Green Man, concerning the disgrace of Major Robert Rogers, patriot and poet, opens Wednesday for a two-week run at the Macmillan Theatre. Students $3; call 978-8868.

Also opening, but off-campus, The Komagata Maru Incident, detailing the plight of Sikhs attempting to enter Canada in 1914. At the Factory Theatre, call TWP at 925-8640. At Minkler Auditorium, call 491-8877, a farce in a vicarage. See How They Run. Bye Bye.

Menaka Thakkar: Indian classical dance in a new setting

"In India we get very little chance to see the Western forms of dance," says Menaka Thakkar. "Very occasionally some company will come and they will perform only two shows in Bombay. So you get tickets or sometimes you don't."

Menaka Thakkar? The lady is a dancer — an Indian classical dancer to be precise. She also teaches Indian classical dance in Toronto and frankly, Indian classical dance couldn't have a better or more enthusiastic spokeswoman than this dark-eyed, petite beauty. Thakkar came to Toronto from her native Bombay in 1972 to see Western dance styles specifically and Western culture in general and she has hardly looked back since.

It all began here on The University of Toronto campus five years ago at U.C. Playhouse where Thakkar gave her first Canadian performance. A large percentage of that night's audience were keenly interested in both seeing more Indian classical dance and also in studying it. Thakkar says she would have been more than happy to oblige immediately but having been on a visitor's visa there was nothing she could do.

After Thakkar made the crucial decision to move to Toronto and passed through the normal bureaucratic channels, "slowly" she emphasizes, to obtain a work permit and landed immigrant status, the rest is history. But it's a personal history made richly colourful by Thakkar's wide enthusiasm for spreading knowledge about the Indian classical dance. She has performed all over Canada, has performed in the United States and, for the past two and a half years has been teaching, dividing her time between York University, private lessons and her school operated out of a Bathurst Street studio.

Thakkar's older sister by ten years was a dancer and initially fostered her desire to learn Indian classical dance while she was studying drawing and painting. This spirited woman whose first name actually means "heavenly dancer" never did pursue painting but instead began to build on the basis in dance received from her sister. Not unlike the proverbial sponge, she eagerly travelled from Bombay to Cuttack, Delhi, Madras and back again in order to absorb all that was possible.

It doesn't take long into a conversation with Thakkar to realize that she takes great delight in learning and teaching; communication or, more succinctly, the transfer of knowledge could easily be called a prime motivating factor in her life. Eyes fairly brimming with excitement, she grows cheerfully animated while discussing the many aspects of Indian classical dance or her pleasant experiences in Canada as a dancer.

One of Thakkar's finer experiences has been the performing tour of Canada that she is in the midst of at present. The Touring Office of the Canada Council and Air India have made it possible for Thakkar to not only perform from Vancouver to Toronto and in four U.S. cities but, to do so with four well-known Indian musicians who were especially brought over for this purpose. Until now, she has been forced to dance to taped Indian music in North America and it would be an understatement to say that she is grateful for this opportunity.

Thakkar's performance at the St. Lawrence Centre Town Hall tomorrow night is part of this tour and one of the musicians, the conductor-cymbal player, is Guru Nana Kasar who was her dance teacher for seven years in the Bharatnatyam style. Of the seven different forms of Indian classical dance, she has chosen two which she favours and in which she has specialized. The other is Odissi.

Bharatnatyam, originating from South India, and Odissi, from the North, are both ancient, solo dance forms which tell stories based upon Indian myths and epics. Devotion is a basic emotion according to Thakkar because both these dance forms have their origins in religious worship in the Indian temple. They are distinguished most readily by their quality of movement. Bharatnatyam is more angular, broad and sharp while Odissi is the more fluid, lyrical and sculptural.

Is the solo aspect of Indian classical dance a challenge? "Oh yes, very much," Thakkar assures me. "When it's a dance drama and you just have to become one character it's easy," she explains. "From the beginning you can get into it and you can just enact one route but here, immediately, you have to change from one character to another." Thakkar rapidly snaps her fingers to emphasize this point. Obviously, she is fascinated with the process of becoming a multitude of characters in quick succession. How rapid a pace can she possibly maintain, one wonders? Thakkar has a confident smile — it's encouraging.

Voluptuous and delicate opener

A magnificent rendition of Messiaen's Turangalila Symphonie was presented at Massey Hall this week by the Toronto Symphony under Andrew Davis, with soloists Pierre-Laurent Aimard at the piano and Jean Laurendeau at the Ondes Martenot.

The Turangalila Symphonie is one of the most popular of Messiaen's works. Its subject is the Tristan myth, or in Messiaen's words: "a fatal irresistible love that invokes death for it transcends the body". The Turangalila is the second of three works that deal with this theme.

Messiaen's great influence on 20th century music has been in the field of rhythm. Here, he moves in direct line from Beethoven through Stravinsky, contributing original material particularly with the use of "retrogradable rhythm," which he borrowed from Hindu music.

As an orchestrator he is a sensualist who descends from Berlioz and who seeks "to delight the senses with delicate voluptuous pleasures". In the Turangalila, he unleashes an intense torrent of innumerable sonorities of infinite delicacy. It is most unusual that the TSO should open its season with such a difficult work. The rhythms alone are complex beyond description. Nevertheless the orchestra and soloists worked as one, and fully met the demands of this extraordinary masterpiece.

The Turangalila is for Ondes Martenot, piano solo and very large orchestra and lasts about 1½ hours. The Ondes Martenot is an electric instrument that makes possible the use of many new timbres and accents. A curious feature of Messiaen's orchestration is that he effectively uses the tiny tinkle of the celesta, glockenspiel, vibraphone, triangle and small gong all from the Ondes Martenot — to punctuate and increase frightening and ominous moods.

The work is in ten movements. The Introduction is forbidding, electrifying, and primitive. Song of Love begins with increasing moments of tension as the orchestra moves feverishly, with both sharp staccatos and long melodic phrases, toward a bold climax with a dramatic ending. Turangalila 1 has a haunting sadness. Song of Love 2 is delicate, playful, and tender. Joy of the Stars Blood weaves in and out of tonality, clusters, chromaticism and modality and uses a variety of rhythms, instruments, and colours. Throughout, the TSO was breathtaking. Davis wielded it and the soloists like a sorcerer invoking a swirl of colours. Garden of Love's Slumber is a luminous interlude surrounded by a halo of unreality. This and the previous movement show a strong 1940's American pop influence. Turangalila 2 begins with moderate percussion and works into a climax with a piano solo. Unfolding of Love first expresses a mood of terror then returns to jazzy American sound. Turangalila 3 combines earlier fragments and moods. The Final has storm, lightning, joy and glory all in one.

While some 100 members of the audience of several hundred left between movements of the work, those who stayed were justly enthusiastic. The TSO and soloists played with verve and confidence. It was a stunning way to open a season.

First Place On Line In Saturday Showdown

By JIMO'LEARY

The number one ranked Blues play their most crucial game of the season this Saturday as they travel to London to meet the second ranked Western Mustangs in a game which will decide first place in the Western Division of the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference. To secure first place, the Blues only need a tie, whereas Western needs a victory to overcome the two point advantage Toronto presently holds.

In the event of a tie for first place, Western will be given the nod because they will have defeated the Blues in their regular season encounter.

In a similar situation last year Toronto rallied to defeat the Mustangs 25-19 and clinch the top spot. To do the same tomorrow, Blues will have to come up with their best performance of the year.

Western has a powerful squad which came out of the gate quickly this fall and held first place in the national rankings until they were upset by Laurier on the third of October. They lead the league in both total offence (216 pts.) and defence (44 pts. allowed).

The offence is led by league leading quarterback Jamie Bone. Bone has thrown for 1,322 yards and a 61.2 percent completion average. His 1,322 yards leads second place Dan Feraday by a whopping 475 yards.

After the graduation of Rick Scarborough from last year's team, many felt that Western's running game would be greatly slowed down. This has not been the case, thanks to the acquisition of Ross Tripp from McMaster and the development of Bill Rozalowsky into a fine runner.

Tripp gives Western tough running up the middle and has proven to have a nose for the goal line. In his six games to date, he has scored nine touchdowns. For a big man he also has good speed as his 5.9 yard rushing average will attest.

Along with Tripp, Western boasts the best number two running back in the league in Rozalowsky. Rozalowsky has proven to be both a dangerous runner (8.6 yard average) and receiver.

When Bone is not handing the ball to one of his backs, he is throwing to one of his fine corps of receivers. Nigel Wilson's speed makes him a threat whenever he touches the ball. He has caught the ball 18 times for a 21.6 average, scoring three touchdowns. Along with Wilson the Mustangs have Dennis Hemphill who has come up with 17 receptions and 17.9 yard average.

Despite all this power the Western offence is not unstoppable. In their loss to Laurier, the Golden Hawks held the Mustangs to 17 points. Against Windsor they were held to 22 points.

The outcome of Saturday's game will depend on the Blues' ability to contain the Mustang's scorers. They will have to force Western to the air and rely on a strong performance from their pass defence.

Toronto's performance to date has shown that the Blues are capable of playing great defensive football. Many times throughout the season the defence has held the team in the game until the offence got rolling.

With the use of the three-five alignment, the Blues should have better success containing Bone's passing. Success will depend on the defensive line putting pressure on Bone and on the secondary coming up with the key interceptions as they have done in the past. If the defence can hold the Mustangs to under 20 points, the offence should be able to do the rest.

With all the talk of the offensive power of the Mustangs it should not be forgotten that the Blues also possess a potent offence. If the defence can keep them in the game, Feraday and company should be able to put the points on the board.

Like Tripp, John Goodrow has also proven to be deadly near the goal line, scoring nine touchdowns for this year. Goodrow also leads both the Mustang runners in rushing yardage, having gained 570 yards to date.

In Feraday, the Blues also have a great passer. Feraday has progressed steadily throughout the season and should be in peak form for Western.

When Feraday wants to pass he has the best receiver in the league to throw to in Chris Kotsopoulos. Kotsopoulos has accumulated a remarkable 534 yards on receptions and leads the rest of the league by far in this category.

Whatever the outcome of Saturday's game, the Blues' next home game will be a playoff encounter at Varsity Stadium on November 5 against either Laurier or Windsor.

Loss To Guelph Costly To Blues

By HUGH STUART

The Rugby Blues' loss to York two weeks ago put the team in a position where every game is a 'must' game. Unfortunately for the Blues they lost one of those 'must' games on Wednesday at Guelph.

In past years a game at Guelph would have been considered to be a break in the schedule for the stronger teams in the league. But the upstart Gryphons have changed that thinking with their impressive showing so far this season. They certainly made believers out of the Blues in racking up a 16-3 victory.

Guelph got on the board early with a converted try but the Blues answered with a Chris Alexiou field goal to narrow the score to 6-3. That three point margin was as close as the Blues would get as the home team piled up ten unanswered points and rolled to victory.

The Blues do not have much time to drown their sorrows, as they have another tough match against the second place Western Mustangs on Saturday. A plus for the Blues is the fact that the game will be played at home since the team is undefeated on its own field. U of T still has a mathematical chance to make the playoffs but a loss on Saturday will ruin their chances. It will be tough sledding, and the Blues don't just need points, they need fans. Understand?

The Third Half; The Seconds also lost to Guelph; by a 12-6 score. Karl Heck scored the Blues' only try on a long sideline romp and Doug Brent converted. The old boys game will be played (at last) on Tuesday night at Varsity Stadium (yes, Varsity Stadium) at 7:30. With so many talented players participating, it would be well worth a visit.

Loss For Women's Squash

By REGINA HICKL-SZABO

The U of T Women's Squash Team lost their first tournament in the Toronto District Women's Squash Association (TDWSA) on Tues. Oct. 18th, at the Regency Racket Club (RRC) in Brampton. The RRC won all four games and said team member Gayle MacDonald, "We just weren't moving for the ball."

The other members included Eva Van Wouw, Gaylene Pron, and Chris Young. Since three of the courts played on were closed, only Pron's game had spectators. "Gaylene played some good shots, but realized too late that her opponent was a 'South paw'," said MacDonald.

"My opponent's strength lay in that she was well-experienced in tournament play," said Pron. "But she was out of condition, and had we played any longer, it might have been a different story." Pron lost by scores of: 9-5, 9-6 and 9-7.

About her own game, MacDougall admits she played "terribly" due to "poor service reception". "My first long shot came in my fourth game!" When asked whether she could determine any of her opponents weaknesses, MacDougall laughed: "I don't know if she was four months pregnant or not, but she had a belly out to here!"

Van Wouw was surprised to find her opponent was a much improved former rival. "Personally, Eva just had an off night," said Pron.

A lack of court practice seemed to be the general complaint of the team members. "Consider we've only been on the courts for two weeks," said MacDougall. "Just wait till Christmas!"

The next TDWSA tournament will take place at Valhalla in Etobicoke, on Oct. 31 at 8 p.m. Spectators are more than welcome to attend.

Royal Reception For Rowing Team

By GNAT FINDLAY

So far this fall the Varsity rowing team has enjoyed the most successful season in its' history. They have won a pair of races in Toronto, a first at Trent and made a clean sweep of the four mens' eights in Hamilton.

Unfortunately the winning trend failed to carry the crews to a victory at the Western regatta last weekend. The poor showing in London failed to surprise any of the crew members. Knowing that the varsity heavyweight and lightweight crews would not be participating, they had the whole burden of representing the team against some superior crews. An honourable mention must go to the novice crew which raced in the junior varsity race and managed to defeat a strong team from McMaster.

Meanwhile, a strong lightweight eight and a pair from the varsity crew travelled to Ottawa that day to represent the team at the Rideau regatta.

In celebration of her silver jubilee, Queen Elizabeth honoured the regatta by being on hand to present the medals to the winners of the special 200 metre sprint. This race was won by an underdog crew from Upper Canada College.

U of T was strongly represented in the lightweight eights, picking up fourth place in a field of 12 crews. Gnat Findlay, the powerhouse of the Varsity eight, churned down the 3 mile course to take another 4th place finish in the singles event. His time of 24 minutes 57 seconds was exceptional considering he spends most of his time in the eight.

The Blues' only victory came in the open pair rowed by Matt Lawton and Tim Turner. They came on to defeat 9 other crews and set a course record for the pairs.

With the OUAA championships less than two weeks away, the crews are working exceptionally hard to recover the winning trend shown at the start of the season. U of T should be heavy favourites to take the title away from current champions, Western. It would certainly be a fitting way to close such a fine season, and set the tone for next year.

Scarborough Comes From Behind To Beat Vic

By JIMO'LEARY

If Wednesday's game is any indication, complacency is the only thing the unbeaten Scarborough Maroons will have to battle on their way to the A Division championship of the Interfac Football League. Against last place Victoria, the Maroons started slowly and had to come back from behind to take a 21-12 victory.

The Maroons started as if they figured all they would have to do is show up to get two points. Before they realized that they were in a football game, they found themselves behind 9-0.

Vic's first points came on a perfectly executed halfback option with Griesdorf getting the touchdown. Paterson was good with the convert, giving Vic a 7-0 lead.

Working from deep in their own end, Scarborough was forced to give up a two point safety when quarterback Jim McLeod stepped out of the shallow endzone.

These nine points were the first points Scarborough has surrendered this season and was enough to stir the offence from their slumber.

In the second quarter, McLeod took command and erased the Vic lead by directing two Scarborough scoring drives.

On the first, his pinpoint passing led the Maroons 55 yards downfield for the major. On this drive a touchdown was called back when the official ruled that Russ Henderson had trapped the ball in the endzone. Undaunted, the Maroons regrouped and Henderson took the ball over on a seven yard sweep. McLeod was good with the convert.

The next time Scarborough got the ball they marched back down field and scored another major. Again the work of McLeod and Henderson was instrumental in the drive.

The drive was capped when on a third down gamble, McLeod hit Henderson in the endzone.

The Maroons caught Vic off guard and completed a pass to Bubursky for the two point convert. The half ended with Scarborough leading 15-9.

Vic closed the gap to three in the fourth quarter when Paterson was good with a 25-yard field goal. From this point Vic started to press and had Scarborough pinned deep in their own territory. Once again, however, a fine play by Henderson not only got the Maroons out of trouble, but salted away the game.

On second down from the Maroon one yard line, Henderson swept right, behind a wall of blockers and took the ball on a spectacular 109 yard run for a touchdown. The high stepping Henderson went practically untouched as he turned on the afterburners outdistancing all pursuers. The convert was blocked making the final score 21-12.

The fourth quarter was marred by the dirty play. The convert attempt after the final touchdown erupted into a brawl between Pat from Vic and the Maroons' Raponi. Both players were ejected.

Vic's Harris was later ejected after he was caught kicking a Scarborough player. It seems that he forgot that a ball is provided for players who like to kick.

The co-ed softball tournament scheduled to be held on the Front Campus this Saturday has been postponed. Participants are asked to watch SPORTSWEEK for the new date of the tournament.

Decision on library ignores Eng fac

By TOM KUHN

Nearly 100 Applied Science and Engineering professors met Friday afternoon in an emergency session of the Faculty Council to pass motions strongly critical of the central administration's attempts to unilaterally determine allocation of space in the reconstructed Sir Sanford Fleming Building.

The council members, summoned at 48 hours notice by the written request of 30 professors, voted unanimously for the motions charging the office of the Vice-President with violation of due process. They insisted that the faculty have the right to examine any library consolidation proposal.

The university administration has requested that the Planning and Resources Committee of the Governing Council consolidate the Engineering library, along with six other departmental libraries, in the McLennan Building. The Engineering library at present is the only student study space in the Galbraith-Fleming complex.

The administration's proposal calls for the complete relocation of the Faculty of Forestry into the new Sanford Fleming building, as well as Student Record Services. The computer center will be moved off campus to facilitate regional services with York University and Ryerson.

Other departments whose libraries will be consolidated under the proposal include Physics, Computer Science, Mathematics and Chemistry. Books from the Science and Medicine Library will also be housed in the McLennan Building, according to Professor Harry Eastman's administrative report.

Civil Engineering department chairman G.W. Heinke charged that the administration's proposal came forth without any consultation with the faculties of Engineering, Forestry, or Computer Sciences.

At the time of the Sanford Fleming fire last February, the university set up an Overview Committee to advise U of T president John Evans with respect to options for the permanent accommodation of those displaced by the fire.

During the summer, Evans set up another committee after receiving the Overview Committee's report. This new "Users' Committee" was to work with a firm of architects retained by U of T to determine space allocation. The Planning and Resources Committee has already approved a proposal arising from these advisory bodies.

When the Users' Committee, however, submitted its report to the architects on October 1, they recommended that the entire Sanford Fleming Quadrangle be built to four floors, contrary to what was originally planned.

Thus, the administration then sent its unilateral request to Planning and Resources with changes never recommended by either the Overview Committee, the Users' Committee, or any department or faculty involved, according to Heinke.

"Due process was set up by the university to overcome the fire of February 1977. A lot of work was done by many, many people," said Heinke.

His motion, passed unanimously, "deplored" the university administration's disregard of the duly-constituted, orderly process of space rationalization set out in the submission of the unilateral memorandum of October 18 from the Office of the Vice-President.

Professor K.C. Smith, chairman of the Department of Electrical Engineering, questioned the wisdom of the central administration.

"I think the success in this university is based upon voluntary service, not upon paid work. Anyone who equates work at the university with a simple job is foolish," Smith said. He added that U of T would succeed on "the goodwill of those who work here."

Smith, who along with Heinke and Dean Bernard Etkin were the only people to attend all the meetings regarding space allocation, said it was "highly questionable" whether he would offer such a service again in the future.

Harry Eastman, Vice-President of Planning and Resources, whose office was responsible for the report's provoking the emergency meeting, said: "We (the central administration) should take opportunity of anything we can exploit."

Eastman pointed out that the consequences of library consolidation were far more disadvantageous for the other departments involved. He said the library in the Sanford Fleming building didn't count as engineering space, but rather "library space."

The results, however, for engineering students would be disadvantageous either way, said David Tennenhouse, graduate student in engineering.

"Each department provides library and study space. When this is consolidated it means the students will have to go walking (to get a suitable place to study)," said Tennenhouse.

"It was slimy the way the administration planned the move of both the library and the computer center," he added.

Professor S.M. Uzumeri, a member of the Users' Committee, was even more strongly critical. The document from the administration had no name attached. Uzumeri condemned the irresponsibility of such strong initiative by the administration.

"I don't even know who is responsible for this document. Is it a committee in the Vice-President's office, is it some administrative staff, or who?" asked Uzumeri.

The administration's proposal, along with the Engineering Faculty motions, will be taken up today at 4 p.m. in an open meeting of the Planning and Resources Committee in Simcoe Hall.

Radio Erindale: Medium 1 provides fine radioactivity

By JOHN D'ANGELO

Radio Erindale has come of age this year. Armed with a newly-established board of directors numbering 11, a new constitution, an almost entirely revamped distribution system, and a successful recruitment campaign, the station is now putting out "good quality radio entertainment," according to Technical and Internal Manager Rick Harrison.

Amidst the trees, grass, and country paths of Erindale campus, Radio Erindale (CFRE) emanates to student residences, lounges, cafeterias, and pubs 16 hours a day, from 8 a.m. to 12 midnight, 5 days a week.

This year's manager, Greg Tyndall, has laid out a set of ground rules which will have the station operating "very much like a professional establishment," although technically the station need not adhere to CRTC rulings.

Disk jockeys must prepare their programs two days in advance and submit them for approval by the program directors, Angelo Rocca, and Roksolana Blawacka. The directors also make sure there is one-third Canadian content in the programming.

The atmosphere at the station is far from one of subjugation and overseriousness, as Tyndall promotes a mixture of hard work and good fun among the staff. Each D.J. is allotted one show a week and is free to choose the program format and style.

Programs range from FM and AM rock, to classical, and even one French-Canadian program. News and comments are given by news editor Jack Shand at 12:15, 2, 4, and 6 p.m. each day.

Radio Erindale had its origins in 1967, according to Rick Harrison. The station possessed one turntable and a modest system of speakers. By 1972 enough additional equipment had been bought by the college to ensure Radio Erindale's future.

When the original Erindale newspaper, The Erindalian, folded shortly afterwards, the radio station was left as the only source of college news. When the newspaper was re-established it was christened Medium II, in recognition of Radio Erindale's precedence as "medium I."

Currently, the station is operating from just one studio, which limits the broadcasting hours to weekdays, so that the facilities can be used for production work such as taping commercials and interviews during the station's off-air hours. The present lack of taping facilities can make the production of an intricate 60 second commercial take up to 6 hours.

To alleviate these problems, plans have been approved for the construction of a sound room and second studio equipped with two turntables, two reel-to-reel tape machines, two cart machines, a mixing board, and a cassette deck. Harrison estimates building of the studio should start sometime in November and be completed by January, at a cost of $15,000 if all new equipment is bought.

The station is submitting a budget this week of some $10,000 for more equipment, distribution lines, and salaries for the board of directors commensurate with the staff of Medium II. Tyndall is hoping for a salary of $60 per week, his assistant, George Gall, $12 per week, and the rest of the staff $5 per week.

By SEAN DUNPHY

U of T President John Evans denied allegations made in The Varsity that the university will be "looking after its own" in the face of declining enrolment in coming years. He also defended his decision to receive the delegation from the University of Stellenbosch. Evans was speaking at the Governing Council meeting held at Scarborough College Thursday night.

Evans said about The Varsity article of September 26 which stated U of T will take care of itself at the expense of other smaller universities, that he has "not been able to identify the group of professors" which The Varsity claimed were forming this policy.

At the same time Evans presented the preliminary enrolment statistics for this year. The overall figures reveal that, excluding the Faculty of Education, full-time undergraduate enrolment is down 1.4 percent, and part-time is down 4 percent. Evans pointed out that the trend is expected to continue, as Grade 13 registration is down, and fewer Grade 13 grads are seeking higher education.

Evans defended the decision to receive the Stellenbosch delegation by saying that Simcoe Hall was bound by the present university policy of academic openness, "regardless of how abhorrent the present regime in South Africa may be."

Undergraduate representative Chris Rogers responded that although he shared Evans' concern for academic openness, the University of Stellenbosch cannot be considered as a bona fide institution of learning because of its racist policies and role as the "intellectual architect of apartheid." Rogers said that in the eyes of the South Africans, the reception of the delegation would be seen as an endorsement of apartheid by U of T.

Evans argued that "one cannot associate openness with endorsement," pointing out that in the past, U of T has received delegations from universities around the world. He asked where the line would be drawn if the university were to make a policy with regard to totalitarian governments. He asked Council to continue the policy of academic openness, pointing out that in the past, universities have been instruments of non-violent change.

Undergraduate representative Phil Ryan charged that the administration had had plenty of time to consult Council concerning such a change in policy. He said they had known about the visit from South Africa since June, but chose to keep quiet. He suggested that U of T formulate a policy with regard to the actual request to visit, pointing out that the University of Cape Town has resisted apartheid. He concluded by paraphrasing Dante: "the university can't maintain a position of neutrality in times of moral crises."

Evans, on the other hand, said the university must have a consistent and defensible policy. He received support from most other members of Council. Undergraduate representative Michael Treacy commended Evans' handling of the affair. Rose Wolf stated that she was tempted to disagree with academic openness when the Student Administrative Council (SAC) sponsored a visit by a member of the Palestine Liberation Organization. She said she realized, however, that the university must be consistent. Barry Coultis offered the opinion that "institutions don't have opinions."

Academic Affairs Committee Chairman Michael Bliss once again protested compulsory non-academic fees. He said that when the Internal Affairs Committee conducted a review of these fees, they requested submissions only from groups like SAC "which have a vested interest in the maintenance of them." He said the committee made no attempt to investigate alternatives when it presented its recommendation that the university leave the present policy unchanged. Bliss received no support from other members of Council.

Governing Council also allocated $400,000 for emergency fire safety renovations to bring some of the buildings up to minimum safety standards.

Lalonde speaks on Canada's health-care needs

Lalonde said universities must meet changing health-care needs.

By CAROLINE CONNELL

University health-care education programs must meet the challenge of shifting emphasis and demands in the Canadian health scene, said Marc Lalonde, former Minister of National Health and Welfare. In a talk entitled "Steering Health Policy in Canada 1972-1977" Lalonde said on Friday afternoon that the need for flexibility among professionals in the health fields has become increasingly apparent in recent years.

Lalonde called upon Canadian universities to lead the way in developing new approaches. He advocated increased integration of previously separate fields towards a multi-disciplinary system as the chief goal. Also important are attitudes towards public accountability and preventive medicine he stated.

In this Sesquicentennial lecture sponsored by the Faculty of Pharmacy, Lalonde gave an overview of his five years at the helm of Health and Welfare, discussing changes during his term of office and the future of this field in Canada. Among significant programs instituted under Lalonde were "Operation Lifestyle," a lifestyle-modification approach to preventive medicine, a new federal-provincial cost-sharing system designed for flexibility, a drug quality screening program, and the "Canada Health Survey," to be introduced in 1978 as a basis for planning and research.

As for the future, Lalonde foresees many factors influencing health policy such as the changing role of professionals, environmental concerns, and the social and economic demands on the provinces.

In the September cabinet shuffle, Lalonde was named Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. As Pharmacy Dean W. E. Alexander put it in his introduction, he is now caring for the health of Canada, instead of the health of Canadians.

Editorial meet Wednesday 4pm

The topic to be discussed at next Wednesday's staff meeting will be National Unity (N.U.). Yes folks, the Varsity has finally decided to make its definitive pronouncement on this burning issue. Starting at 4.00 p.m. staffers will deliberate on the topic until they come up with the position to be adopted henceforth by the Varsity. This will mean not just our editorial position but also how we want to cover the government's N.U. campaign.

Writers-in-residence conference

Changes proposed for writers program

By GEORGE COOK

In future a student will sit on the Writer-in-residence Committee at U of T. That was one of several changes in the program resulting from the writers-in-residence conference held last Wednesday and Thursday at Hart House.

The student, who has yet to be named, will help the committee with the selection of each year's writer-in-residence and with the administrative work involved.

Two suggestions made by John Newlove, last year's writer-in-residence, have already been implemented. The first entails alterations to current advertisements to better inform students of the writer-in-residence's presence at Massey College. The second involves some thirty student writers who, on Newlove's suggestion, will meet with Carol Bolt, this year's writer-in-residence, on Thursday at 8 p.m. in Hart House.

It was generally agreed by the members of Wednesday's and Thursday's panel of writers that the writer-in-residence's office should be moved from Massey College. Hart House was proposed as a possible alternative.

Asked after Thursday's seminar if this suggestion would be acted upon, Sam Solecky, a member of the seven person writer-in-residence committee, said it would be "seriously discussed."

A further recommendation made by Newlove and taken up again on Thursday by Adele Wiseman, that the writer-in-residence's one year term be extended to two or three, will also be considered, according to Solecky.

MORE FUNDS REQUIRED

He said he plans to make representations to the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) and the Canada Council for funds. At present the Canada Council will not approve money for more than a one-year term, Solecky stated.

The conference itself, sponsored by SAC, the Canada Council and the Ontario Arts Council, was a joint project of the SAC sesquicentennial committee and the Hart House Library Committee.

Wednesday's participants included Margaret Atwood, John Newlove, Jack Ludwig and Carol Bolt. Eli Mandel chaired the seminar. Thursday saw the participation of Josef Skvorecky, W. O. Mitchell, and Adele Wiseman, with a return visit from Bolt. The seminar was chaired by Solecky.

All the participants were writers-in-residence at U of T at one time.

The afternoon seminars were well attended. Over the two days, several hundred people came to the Hart House music room to participate in discussion.

The experiences of the various writers during their time at U of T differed widely.

"Sometimes I thought I was just a token. I felt like a trained ape," Newlove quipped.

"The university didn't do much for me. My profile was higher outside U of T than it was inside," Atwood maintained.

HALF-WAY HOUSE TO REALITY

Of Wednesday's participants only Jack Ludwig looked back with pleasure on his stay at U of T. He said students came to him during the sixties as if he were "a half-way house to reality." He took particular pride in having brought Robert Lowell to the campus.

"I'd like a lot more access to students. I don't see the point otherwise," Bolt stated.

On Thursday, Adele Wiseman lamented the fact that none of the activities she began in 1975-76 were followed up. "I did my song and dance. Continuing support should come from the university," she said.

Josef Skvorecky, who left Czechoslovakia in 1968 and now teaches at Erindale College, recalled his satisfaction at being offered the residency. He said he considered it evidence that Canada was "a nice country."

"The universities should shelter the artists of the country," W. O. Mitchell said. The writer-in-residence should be "an artistic godfather" to prospective writers, he maintained.

Student reaction to Wednesday's seminar was mixed.

"I don't know why I come to these things. They're a waste of time," one disgruntled graduate student said.

"Most of the people who came to the seminar are writers in one way or another. Here you can voice your opinion," Nancy Paterson (VIC II) commented.

"It wasn't very exciting, but what can they (the writers) say. I heard what I expected to hear," a student from the Faculty of Education said.

Phil Brown, this year's editor of the U of T Review, a campus literary magazine, found the seminars useful. "We lack a centre of creative activity on campus. This is an initial step," he stated.

Margaret Atwood surfaces at writers' bash.

Literati woop it up at bash at Pauline's digs

By GEORGE COOK

The suite is sheltered from the outer world by folds of drapery hung over leaded windows. The light of crystal chandeliers scintillates on the polished surfaces of exquisite tea tables. Cushioned settees repose on a plush, red-velvet carpet against dark, wood-paneled walls. Musty portraits of military gentlemen and regal ladies gaze imperturbably down on the assembled literati who mill about, shining glasses and ready wit on the tips of their tongues.

Such was the scene last Wednesday afternoon as Her Excellency the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, Pauline McGibbon, hosted a reception for the writers-in-residence conference.

Some one hundred students, members of the public, professors and the writers themselves spent a tasteful 90 minutes in the Lieutenant-Governor's suite at Queen's Park.

Cocktails and hors d'oeuvres were served to the guests who conversed as freely as they ate and drank.

Among the writers were Margaret Atwood, John Newlove, W. O. Mitchell, Jack Ludwig, Carol Bolt (this year's writer-in-residence), and the myriad unknown and unpublished who mingled with the established figures.

Later on Wednesday evening a public reading was held in the Great Hall of Hart House.

Carol Bolt read excerpts from three plays, Newlove several poems, Atwood the same and Ludwig a scene from a new novel as well as an unpublished short story.

On Thursday Josef Skvorecky read from a recently published novella entitled "The Bass Saxophone." W. O. Mitchell read from "Who Has Seen the Wind", while Adele Wiseman gave readings from a selection of poems and a soon to be published book. Carol Bolt again recited from her plays.

After each night's reading a reception was held in the music room of Hart House.

Denying The Obvious

It's good to know that John Evans takes us seriously enough to bother denying that U of T is looking after itself and leaving other universities in the lurch. But what's the point of denying a policy that is public knowledge?

In his first speech before Governing Council Evans unveiled a new government policy to provide undergraduate funding on the basis of "quality." A week later Vice-President of Research and Planning Harry Eastman was quoted as saying he favours a similar funding system for graduate studies.

To top it all off the Interim Report of the Planning and Priorities Subcommittee released today makes as its first recommendation that the university "continue to seek strongly a provincial funding system that reflects its special features, including the possibility of uncoupling support for some of these from formula funding." Translated into every day language this means funding that is only partially based on enrolment, the other consideration being individual support for programs U of T excels in. The report also makes "reinforcement of excellence" the foremost priority for resource allocation.

U of T, it turns out, has more "special features" than any other university in Ontario. It has for example 30 doctoral programs that are not offered anywhere else in Ontario. Many of the other programs, you can be sure, are of higher "quality" than similar programs offered elsewhere. Quality as defined by the report means "relative standing internationally, nationally, and provincially; quality of staff and students attracted; peer judgement as reflected in external research grants attracted, ACAP assessments and accreditation reviews; scholarly work in publications of books and research articles; professional work and artistic achievement, where appropriate; quality of instruction; constructive entrepreneurial activity in program development, fund-seeking, etc."

Based on these criteria, U of T and the bigger universities could in terms of quality beat the smaller universities hollow. Moreover, U of T is making sure that it stays in the lead. The corporate money from the Update campaign, for example, is being used to "seed" new, high-quality projects.

What this means is that while U of T, like all the other universities (but less so than the smaller ones), will be facing decreasing enrolment, it will be able to maintain its present level of funding through "special features" grants. The smaller universities will survive only if they excel in some area that U of T is not strong in. In plainer language they will more or less become ancillaries to U of T. Some could disappear.

There is little doubt that in pushing for a funding policy that would give it an advantage the university is being self-serving. Evans may want to deny this because he doesn't want to alarm the smaller universities. At this point, however, few people will take his denials seriously.

What some would suggest is that the new funding policy is an attempt to rationalize the cutbacks in government allocations to education. The cutbacks in fact are referred to directly or indirectly in two of the premises upon which the Planning and Priorities interim report is based:

"(1) The university is in a period of deficit or, at best, break-even budgets.

"(2) We do not expect that government support for post-secondary education will grow in real terms."

What the U of T administration is doing is making the cutbacks more palatable. It's allowing the government, helping it in fact, to turn cutbacks into a scramble between universities. One can understand of course that the university cannot go bankrupt merely to prove its rejection of cutbacks. One does notice, however, that the administration is almost going out of its way to help the government. In the recent past it has attempted to pass on the cutbacks to the library workers and the support staff. It is now trying to do the same thing with the smaller universities.

Bill Davis must be smiling.

Reform Caucus

Last Monday's Varsity contains an article on the Faculty Reform Caucus apparently based in part on a telephone conversation with me. Since I have not been a very active member of the organization in the past few years (and was away on leave last year) I suggested that your reporter call other members of the Caucus. However, I made a few comments which were misunderstood, and in one case misrepresented.

It is true that there is a connection between the origin of the Reform Caucus and the student demonstrations around the day care centre and access to the Robart's Library. These, as well as controversies around faculty-student parity in the late 1960's and early 70's, found many faculty members deploring a division in the University which often pitted faculty against students, and this sentiment was important in the formation of the Caucus. Faculty members (for better or for worse) are rather good at disagreeing with one another even when they are in basic agreement, so it is not surprising that the Reform Caucus did not always take stands when it came to supporting this or that student-led demonstration, including the ones mentioned in the article. I suggested that your reporter call me back after I, with other members of the Caucus, had pieced together an accurate history of the organization's positions on various issues, and I shall still do this if the Varsity wants it.

The article says that the Reform Caucus is "now numbering three". When your reporter asked me if this was the case, I emphatically answered, no. I listed about a dozen names of well known faculty members who have been more or less active on the steering committee, and said that I did not know the total membership. (I recall that about a year and a half ago, when I last saw the membership list, it numbered over 100.)

Terrorism

So Mario Cutajar condemns terrorist acts such as the recent plane hijacking in Germany. Great! Although he does this less on moral than pragmatic grounds, those of us who find terrorism morally unacceptable must be thankful for small favors.

But Cutajar also urges us to try to understand the motives of terrorists. He seems to think that the motives of terrorists can be seen as rational. Yet this is just where his essay becomes confusing, because by his own implicit criteria of rationality they cannot.

One criterion of rationality is the ability to choose appropriate means to desired ends. Cutajar apparently believes terrorist acts to be less than rational in this sense, if not only because their acts are counterproductive (he says they can retard revolution), then also because, as he puts it, they are acts of "desperation," comparable to "smashing one's head against the wall."

Another criterion of rationality is consistency. But Cutajar points out that the terrorist chooses to subject to violence as "enemies" some of the very people he professes to want to liberate. Cutajar is charitable enough to call this a "paradox" rather than an inconsistency. Yet it remains difficult to see how committing acts of violence against other people with no better justification than a paradox can be rational.

Perhaps Cutajar understands by having "rational motives" something else. Consider this sentence from his essay:

"To resist being converted into a commodity, within a society that deals exclusively with commodities, is to live your life as violent negation of all that exists around you."

Now aside from the fact that this is simply false, because resistance does not have to be violent, what Cutajar seems to be suggesting is that it is a reasonable response to a dehumanizing situation to carry out a "violent negation of all that exists around you," even if what exists around you includes a lot of other people. But how such a response could be regarded as an affirmation of one's humanity, instead of just the opposite, much less how it could be regarded as reasonable, is completely beyond me. Perhaps Cutajar would call this a "paradox" also.

Women's Studies

The relationship between the title and the text of R. Tepper's article, "Women's Studies verges on Sexism" (Varsity, Oct. 17), is not entirely clear. In the article the chairperson is cited to the effect that the bulk of students enrolled in the program are females; she is also cited to the effect that it is the responsibility of male students to understand women's situations for subsequent career interactions. It is presumably not being claimed that omitting to take a course in the women's studies program is sexist.

There is no doubt that it was recently necessary for some women to organize to impress politicians and the business community of the weight of women's votes and women's dollars. Yet this sort of packaging seems rather inappropriate, and in fact rather ingratulating, in an institution of higher learning. Surely if we aspire to academic and professional equality of opportunity, a program that claims to promote such must be directed to all, irrespective of sex. That does not mean that men should be taking so-called women's studies, but rather that people should be considering sex stereotyping in a holistic and an integrative manner. In fact the whole idea of a women's studies program seems to be a modern application of classical 19th century typological thinking.

I would admit to not having taken any course encompassed within the rubric of women's studies, the reason being that I am not a woman. For the same reason, I would readily admit to not having used the women's washroom in Sidney Smith. The latter is, of course, a trite consideration in the totality of things. The former is not. At the same time, I personally feel that I am not prejudiced in either matter.

If a program of study involves topics such as women in literature or women in the family, it can reasonably only claim to attract female students. Being a graduate student in Anthropology, I would not be particularly thrilled about the prospect of taking a course on men in the Early Pleistocene, or on male osteology, male growth, male infrahuman primates or male genetics!

Readers object to editor's views on terrorism.....

Mentally sick

Having read Mario Cutajar's article in the Oct. 19 issue I feel it is necessary to point out that the motives of revolutionary violence are indeed salient but it is possible to show that violence has disadvantages from language. Admittedly views on political violence are apt to be very subjective. For some, terrorism is an extension of politics, the politics of despair as one Irish terrorist described it. Depending upon your politics, one man's bloody-handed terrorist is another man's heroic freedom fighter. Terrorism is the poor man's method of waging war, a weapon of the weak against the strong, and a highly effective one. Governments like to describe it as pointless violence that achieves nothing, but in fact it is often successful.

The Irish Republicans want half their goals — all but six counties — through terrorism. Algerian nationalists, through the FLN, won independence from France largely by using bloody and indiscriminate terror. It is doubtful that the State of Israel would exist today without the terrorism of the Irgun and the Stern Gang. Yasser Arafat would never have been allowed to set foot inside the UN without the terror of the PLO. Nothing succeeds like excess.

Frequently terrorism is designed to disrupt and discredit the government in power, and it can be the starting point for a full-scale guerrilla war or armed insurrection. For revolutionaries it is a place to begin not a place to stop. But terrorists rarely achieve power for themselves. Instead they prepare a path for moderates who share their aim but shun their methods. Such was the case in Ireland and Israel.

Up to this point I would agree with Mr. Cutajar that revolutionary violence can sometimes be justified. What is disturbing, however, is the accumulating evidence that the lengthening list of hijackers and terrorist groups is packed with the mentally sick. The essential ingredient is an attraction for violence on an international scale rather than the achievement of political ideals. The most flagrant examples of the new terror appearing in Japan, Ulster and the Middle East tend to reflect the "old" terror (that Mr. Cutajar might refer to) found where a virtual war is in progress.

Hiroko Nagata was a 28-year-old pharmacy student and a member of the Red Army when she was arrested for her part in the "Snow Murders." Fourteen Red Army members were stripped bare, tied up and left to freeze to death in the Japanese Alps. Nagata had no coherent ideology. She was the author of the "sokatsu" doctrine, an obscure Japanese word which means "a process of bringing together isolated facts to form one coherent principle." It was used simply as a recipe for murder. Her self-confessed philosophy was: "Once the process of sokatsu starts, only death awaits." Both she and her companion Kunio Bando were classified as catatonics by Japanese psychiatrists.

There are other cases in which psychopaths have found a home among the ranks of extremist and terrorist organizations. Instead of being outcasts of society they become acceptable and in some cases are publicly recognized as leaders. Establishing the extent of the involvement of mentally disturbed people in terrorist groups is no political solution but it may be the first stage in the prevention of some of the senseless killing that passes for terrorism.

Then there are the ultra-leftists who seem to be rational but are doomed to failure because they are fighting the whole world. The successful terrorist groups are usually fighting for independence against a foreign power that occupies their land. Groups that fail are ultra-leftists such as the Red Flag Faction, the National Caucus and the Middle Core Faction. Unlike the leftists of the past they are not Karl Marx's prisoners of starvation. Most, indeed, come from the middle-class. Most also have drifted into ultra-leftism by way of the "established" Communist parties.

The ultras are young people in search of a cause and a faith at a time when the causes that fired the hearts of men decades ago have lost much of their appeal and meaning. They still believe in revolution, but they want the whole world to come crumbling down in order to achieve their goals; it is not just one government but all governments that are corrupt and must fall. Yet because the masses have not rushed to the barricades, the ultras have refined the word "revolution" to mean the bomb and the gun for themselves alone.

Their political philosophy is a mix of negation of a society they find selfish and ugly and a yearning for something beautiful to believe in. But these people are out of step with the times, and their credo leads only to mayhem. They are part of our affluent and unjust age. And because the world changes they too will pass as did the campus rebels of the 60's. It is a pity though, that so many innocents have died, and so many will yet die because these youths cannot find their place in the sun.

Cop-out

I strongly disagree with the opinion expressed in Mario Cutajar's editorial October 19 entitled "Such Violence."

Mr. Cutajar describes capitalism as "an inherently violent system" and goes on to suggest that terrorists who held a West German jet and its passengers hostage are to be excused because "violence against capitalism and its agents is justified."

If Mr. Cutajar is so convinced that "capitalism is an inherently violent system" I ask him to examine the behaviour of the Soviet Union, which is not capitalist.

Aside from annexing several countries and forcibly pulling others into their sphere of domination, the Soviets sent tanks into Hungary in 1956 and Czechoslovakia in 1968, when those countries expressed a desire to be free of Soviet domination.

Soviet citizens with dissenting views are hustled off to prison camps in Siberia, tortured and sometimes murdered. The Stalinist period was one of the bloodiest in world history.

Now look at the capitalist countries. The United States recently got rid of a law-breaking President by constitutional methods. No violence. Governments of the capitalist countries are chosen by the electoral method, not military coups. How many non-capitalist countries in South America, Africa and Asia can boast the same thing?

As for Mr. Cutajar's suggestion that terrorists deserve sympathy because "violence against capitalism and its agents is justified" Mr. Cutajar is taking the "cop-out" approach that society is to blame for everything.

Any person who would hijack a plane, kill the pilot and leave 86 other people expecting death at any time deserves swift execution. You cannot "negotiate" with a terrorist.

The West Germans, like the Israelis before them at Entebbe, are to be congratulated.

Foot in mouth

Re: editorial "Such Violence"
Oct. 19:

Only people with a foot in their mouth can identify violence with criticism. Granted, violence is a form of protest against something or someone.

Criticism, on the other hand, differs from protest in that it posits the negative together with the positive. Protest is pure negation. When you criticize something you usually give a few suggestions about what could be done in the quandry.

Now, when and if:

a) you have nothing intelligent to suggest;

b) you mean well, but you have a foot in your mouth;

c) you are bright and eloquent and bristle with ideas, but for some reason others don't think so;

d) there is a general feeling that you are manic;

then, I guess, you have to take a gun and start shooting.

God knows who are the temperamental German hit-boys and girls of today. One thing is clear: they never made their case convincing enough to convince any significant number of people. Maybe it is dyslexia.

We all know about the evils of capitalism. People turning into things and other equally regrettable facts of life. TV is really a top-secret multi-cycle brainomat that the CIA introduced in the late forties and that now is just finishing off assorted convulsing victims that have collapsed in front of it. After the TV a flood. There is unemployment and inflation.

Cutajar among many others want changes and a better society.

Let us look around the world and in the history books to see if we can come up with a model of something that works. From Germany you don't have to travel far. There is a wall nearby and there is always someone running across it: all in one direction. Far away there is Hong Kong that receives hundreds of refugees a week from the mainland. Behind the communist boundaries there are concentrations of power in the hands of microscopic ruling minorities, inefficient economies with low "productivities" (compare the two Germans), police repression and subdued populace. An honest Marxist today will have to admit that so far a truly Marxist society has not existed.

In the final analysis, there may be a need to redefine violence once again. Sometimes violence is a manifest desperation.

Yuri Kuchinsky

...and the editor answers back

extreme and therefore not a good example since it provokes an instantaneous reaction rather than deliberation. Perhaps I should have been more clear about this: I do not condone hijackings or other forms of random terror. I merely reserve the right to condemn such acts to those who haven't sold their conscience away. Put differently: only revolutionaries can honestly condemn terrorism.

Anderson is playing at semantics when he says that resistance to capitalism need not be violent. Resistance to capitalism cannot mean anything else other than its destruction since capitalism is an all-pervasive system that does not allow for individual escape. If one breathes it's because at some point one has participated in commodity production (wage labour). This being the case it is impossible to break with capitalism without demanding its abolition. And since its abolition involves the overthrow of a class that would not like to be overthrown resistance to capitalism is inherently violent.

Whether or not revolutionary violence is an affirmation of one's humanity is a historical question. In effect the question is a reiteration of the paradox which I pointed out earlier. The end demands means of achieving it but the means define the end. There's no refuge out of this problem except through action and action is not a solution as much as a shouldering of responsibility. Anderson, however, demands of contemplation what contemplation cannot give, namely, relief from the necessity of choosing, a clear and distinct reason for acting in one way but not another.

Jeff Buckstein's objections are more trivial. Whether communism as understood in the USSR is inherently violent or not has no bearing on whether or not capitalism is also violent.

Yuri Kuchinsky has only one relevant point to make in his witty but otherwise pointless letter and that is that violence is a manifestation of despair. I agree but what does that say? People don't despair for no reason. Modern terrorists are the toxins capitalism itself has produced. Despair cannot be automatically dismissed as irrational since under certain circumstances the actions it provokes are the only rational ones.

What you sow you shall reap. As long as that principle is deemed rational revolutionary violence will continue to haunt us with the possibility that it is justified.

Footloose on Back Campus

As I am sure your readers are aware, the University is infiltrated with a plague of insidious creatures whose actions are far more devastating in effect than even those of the locusts of Egypt. Unfortunately, these malign beings can only be recognized as a result of their actions, and are otherwise undetectable. I refer of course to the Phantom Tea-leaves (Cockney rhyming slang for thieves), those amorphous, light fingered ghouls ever ready to prey on any unattended article. Some such souls spectre sequestered a pair of tennis shoes from the Back Campus fields at approximately 5.30 p.m. on Monday 17th inst. Obviously threats of consequent grievous bodily harm would be meaningless, so I shall merely say that I hope the present owner of the tennis shoes contracts corns, blisters and my verrucae.

U of T police: not just security guards

By Peter Sutherland

Although the city of Toronto runs through and all around U of T, the university is often seen as a small city of 55,000. Clearly, there is no geographical barrier which sets us apart; yet the fact that most of the people who live and work at U of T are somehow involved in the process of learning, gives us a distinctive social character. We can also get drunk in our own pubs and we even have our own telephone exchange. And a city, to function normally, must have a means of maintaining law and order. We have that too, in the form of the U of T Police Department — not just a couple of nice, old men but a 43-member force of bona fide agents of law enforcement.

It is this "friendly old security guard" image that Gordon Huff, Manager of Protective Services and Communications, would like to see put aside. According to Huff, each member of the force is sworn in by a judge as a Peace Officer in accordance with the statutes of the Ontario Police Act and possesses the same power of arrest as any municipal policeman.

This is not to say that you should hold yourself back from spitting on the sidewalk when you pass one of those uniformed men you had thought were security guards. In fact Huff, who spent 28 years as a military policeman before coming to U of T, would prefer students to look upon the police as a source of help and not just "someone to nail you when you're doing something wrong."

There has been a security organization of sorts since U of T began. It first came into being as a group of about four watchmen who patrolled the (much smaller then) campus. But from these humble beginnings has emerged a sophisticated organization. Its headquarters are at 581 Spadina Ave. from which operate radio-equipped foot and mobile patrols.

The 43-member force included three women; of whom one is a sergeant and two are police constables. Huff is very satisfied with the work of these women and would like to see more women join the force. He feels, for example, that it is easier for a woman to deal with a problem in a woman's residence.

Huff prefers to hire people with some previous police experience, although this is not a requirement. Those wishing to join the force but who have no experience are sent to community college for courses in law enforcement. There is also a four month in-job probation period during which a new officer is trained and evaluated before becoming a full police constable.

Former Metro Policemen are taught to be more "flexible" since U of T does not really have any "hard core" criminals roaming around. A constable is therefore trained to exercise judgement in view of the circumstances before making an arrest, said Huff. He added that as a rule U of T policemen do not arrest students for "pranks" which violate the criminal code, because of the repercussions of having a police record in terms of finding a job.

Included in the U of T force are three plainclothes policemen who are paid the same wage as regular constables and who work in uniform in the event of a shortage of manpower. They are not intended as "undercover" police per se, but according to Huff their civilian dress allows them to move inconspicuously in situations where that is desirable. By way of example, Huff mentioned an incident of a shoplifter being caught putting textbooks in his briefcase.

U of T Police Constables can also act in a "modest investigative capacity". This means that all "occurrences" are initially investigated by the U of T police, says Huff. When a case becomes serious, however, Metro Police are usually called in. (Another fact that few people are aware of, said Huff, is that Metro Police have full jurisdiction on U of T property, although as a rule, they leave it up to U of T police to patrol the campus unless they are called in.)

'and when did you

Huff explained that if a theft occurs over $100, or if a case leads off-campus, Metro is called. Also, Metro has finger printing equipment which they employ on campus when necessary, since U of T has no such equipment. All "processing" of persons who have been arrested by U of T police is done at 52 division of the Metro Police.

Huff defined U of T police's jurisdiction as roughly the square made up of Bloor, Spadina, College, and Queen's Park, although there are buildings off-campus which also come under their jurisdiction. "We have jurisdiction on all property owned, leased, or occupied by the U of T."

On patrol with U of T's finest

By PETER SUTHERLAND

Police work, like practically anything else, has its share of routine office procedures such as filling out reports, keeping records, and answering phone calls. But the real work of policing takes place (to risk using a tired cliché) "on the street". To get a firsthand taste of what the job of being a U of T Police constable is all about, a Varsity reporter climbed into the back seat of a U of T cruiser and set off to do battle with the forces of evil.

The two constables, "partners in crime" as they jokingly refer to themselves, with whom the Varsity patrolled were Gord Reid, who has been a U of T cop for about nine months, and Reggie Thompson, who has been with the force for three and a half years. Both men have had previous police experience, Reid with the Metro Police and Thompson with the Antigo Police Dept. In fact, according to Reid, everyone on the force has had work of this type prior to joining the U of T force.

"Most of the old-timers were army, and the younger guys are from Metro, O.P.P., or the R.C.M.P."

While there were no shoot-outs or high-speed chases, the evening did give some insights into a cop's duties ("Cop" is short for "Constable on patrol"). A "quiet" evening such as this one, requires the police to do a routine patrol of the grounds keeping an eye out for disturbances, and generally to check buildings, making sure anyone they find is supposed to be there. Reid pointed out, that like any other police job, there can be a long period with very few calls and then one night the police are swamped with them.

We made several building checks throughout the evening. Any time someone was found inside, one of the officers politely asked him what his business was and made a note of it for his report. Reid explained, that a great many students have keys to buildings because they need to use certain materials after hours for their assignments. He said that it is not surprising to run into a student at 3:00 o'clock in the morning if he is trying to meet a deadline.

Thompson mentioned that a person may have forgotten to turn off a tap or may have accidentally started a fire in a wastebasket before leaving the building at night. Having regular checks, he explained, can keep a small mistake from turning into something serious.

Doors are all checked to make certain none have been left unlocked because, as Thompson added, some of the buildings have very expensive equipment and if, for example, a wind happened to stumble in to get out of the cold, the University could suffer an expensive loss.

Winos are a pretty common sight for the police.

There are a few places which are checked regularly because they have outdoor grates beside the building where heat comes through. And in the cold weather they can sleep it off with some escape from the cold.

Sid Smith is one such place and sure enough, as we approached the building, we caught sight of some poor old soul curled up in the shadows. He was woken up and asked to leave. Thompson told him where Scott's Mission was so he could get some food and a roof over his head.

Both constables later expressed sympathy for men like that but felt that moving them on was for their own good. Besides, as Thompson mentioned, not all drunks are that passive. Some get very cantankerous and start swinging and throwing bottles. "We've all had our share of that," he said.

The cops were asked about the kinds of crimes they run into. Reid said that apart from theft and trespassing, there is a fair amount of pranks. Thompson recalled, for example, a night when he came across three Vic students in Queen's Park carrying a couch which they had expropriated from New College. He explained that for a prank like this a student would generally not be arrested. He pointed out that a theft that large ($600) is grand larceny and for a graduating student, a mark like that on his record could be damaging. Reid added, that on several occasions they had talked Metro Police out of making an arrest for that reason.

The biggest problem they encounter as policemen, they explained, is the fact that very few students actually realize that U of T Police have the power of arrest.

Thompson said that when someone gets the idea to pull off some kind of caper, they think that "they only have to look out for the yellow car." He feels that a good deal of petty crime could be prevented if people understood that they risk arrest from U of T police as well as Metro.

Both men realize the hairlessness of most pranks and keep a good sense of humor towards them, but to some people a "prank" can involve pointless destruction. It is this costly and destructive vandalism which they feel would be prevented if students knew the risk of arrest.

Furthermore, both men like to see the force as a public service. Reid said, that they want students to feel that they can phone U of T police for any reason whether it is a large emergency or not.

Thompson added that people can use the police as an information service after regular hours. They are open 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Even in a bad snow storm according to Reid, when virtually the whole university is shut down, the police department is open. "No matter what happens; we work."

U of T policemen patrol both on foot and in radio-equipped cars.

ou first notice this building was missing?"

constables are not issued weapons under any circumstances. Says Huff, "the day that happens, I'll leave." Handcuffs are kept at headquarters but are used only in an emergency and at the discretion of the Sergeant on duty.

Huff said he was "not in a position to disclose" the department's budget but said that most of its goes toward salaries. A patrolman on probation receives an income of $11,710 and upon being promoted to constable has his salary adjusted to $13,229.

The police have two radio-equipped cruisers, and 11 radios worth $1,600 apiece. The headquarters itself has been converted from an old two-storey house. There is no jail or "holding tank" because any crime serious enough to warrant imprisonment is handled at 52 division.

All calls are received in a communications room and dispatched by radio to the constables on patrol. There is also a fire alarm panel with lights corresponding to fire alarms and fire detectors around the campus.

Joseph West, Chief Constable of the U of T Police Dept. is proud of the set-up. He informed The Varsity, that until recently, radio-communications at the U of T police were superior to Metro.

West began as a constable with the U of T police 18 years ago and had been a policeman in England before that. He was asked about any unusual cases he has encountered over his career here. He said that most of the unusual cases have been the pranks of students. He recalls, for example, being called to the rescue of a student chained to a radiator. There have also been floods, and one of the many capers engineered by the Engineers has been firing off gunpowder in the muzzle of one of the old cannons behind SAC.

Most of the crimes that occur on the campus are such things as disturbing the peace, trespassing, breaking and entering, and petty theft. Huff pointed out that there is not much fear of major crimes from students, but being in the heart of a large city means virtually anyone has access to the campus.

He stresses the cardinal rule of crime fighting as crime prevention and frequently gives lectures on common sense methods of protecting oneself and one's property. One of his concerns is for people who come from small towns and possibly do not realize the potential danger of a big city. While he does not wish to instill fear in anyone he recommends sensible precautions to students, such as locking doors when leaving rooms and making sure fire escape doors are fully closed to prevent a thief from entering a residence hall. Also, he reminds girls that if they are working late somewhere on campus and are uneasy walking home by themselves they can feel perfectly free to phone the police who will escort them home. (The U of T Police emergency number is 978-2222.)

Huff is concerned with fostering the image of a policeman as someone "there to help." The police do not exist to be beligerant or to persecute, he says. He mentioned, for example, that while pubs are routinely patrolled from the outside, police seldom enter unless called.

"A pub should be a place to relax without having to look at a blue uniform," he said.

The police department's functions as outlined in the manual are:

- (a) the maintenance of a reasonable standard of security to minimize losses to the university through theft and damage to buildings.
- (b) provision of traffic and crowd control.
- (c) modest investigative capability.
- (d) quick response to occurrences.
- (e) coordination of watchmen's services in buildings.
- (f) support to the administration in times of disorder and unrest.
- (g) provides the university with a method of gathering intelligence and other information from law enforcement agencies and other universities.

(h) provision of cash escorts and delivery of confidential documents and correspondence.

An occurrence is defined as anything which requires the police to come to assistance. Huff estimates that the police can respond to an occurrence in under three minutes.

To give a little more meaning to the term "occurrence" and for a general idea of procedure, Huff was presented with some hypothetical cases and asked what probable action would be taken.

Two cars collide at fifteen mph on Huron St. There were no injuries.

Huff explained that the department has jurisdiction only on university property and hence, a collision on a public street such as Huron would be referred to Metro, should the damage exceed $200. An accident happening in a parking lot or on a street owned by U of T, such as Classic Ave., would be handled by U of T police. He added that jurisdiction is extended in the case of "hot pursuit", which means that if a crime is committed on U of T property, the suspect can be chased off-campus.

A wino is fast asleep across the path at Philosopher's walk, impeding pedestrian traffic.

If he could "navigate", says Huff, he would be told to move on. If he was dead, drunk or causing a disturbance he would be taken to 52 division of the Metro Police.

Two eyewitnesses observe someone stealing a microscope from a lab. They follow him to a room in a boarding house and call U of T police.

U of T police have the power of search within their jurisdiction according to Huff. The man would be arrested and taken to 52 division and his room would be searched. Huff added that any unsolved theft over $100 is referred to Metro.

A seedy looking character wearing knee-socks and a raincoat is standing under a lamp post by the back campus flashing a big smile and that's not all.

He would be placed under arrest and taken to 52.

A shameless woman is offering all manner of sensual delights at a moderate fee to students outside the Vic pub.

She probably would not be arrested, says Huff, unless there is a complaint, but she would be asked to leave university property.

A man is standing in the belfry of the Hart House tower announcing his intention to jump.

U of T would handle the situation initially but Metro would be called in because they have special people to handle that sort of thing, Huff explained. Also, a doctor from psychiatry would probably be summoned.

A speaker is admitted to lecture at Convocation Hall but his philosophy is abhorrent to a certain faction of the student body. They picket Convocation Hall but the man will nevertheless be allowed to speak.

If he needed to be escorted, U of T police would do it, says Huff. However, if it was a peaceful demonstration, no special precautions would be taken. If a riot broke out, U of T police would handle it as well as they could. If it got out of control, Metro would be called. U of T police are neither trained nor equipped as riot police, he explained.

When asked how many cases are solved each year, Huff replied that there was a difference between cases solved and arrests. He estimated that about 25 arrests are made each year. He speculated further that many crimes were deterred by an individual seeing a man in uniform.

So our little "city" has, among other unique features, its own police force. Incidentally, the best way to tell the difference between a U of T cop and a Metro cop is to look at his belt. If there is a holster hanging there he is one of theirs; if not he is one of ours. For people who are intimidated by guns it is somewhat comforting to know that our city is policed by unarmed, unflappable fellows, who try to be "flexible" towards the student temperament.

U of T policemen are often called upon to assist in "traffic and crowd control."

Three inside views of Governing Council

Peter Neilson

By CHRIS STADDON

The question of budgetary cutbacks on student services will be one of the most urgent problems to come before the Internal Affairs Committee, says Peter Neilson, Chairman of the Committee. Neilson, a third-year law student, has been recently elected to the Governing Council for a one-year term as an undergraduate representative.

He wants the university to maintain student services without a huge increase in fees and expresses particular concern about proposed cutbacks to student health services.

"The function of administration is to maintain the quality of student services," he stated.

As for the actual constitution of the council, Neilson would like student membership to be more representative of university faculties but he stresses that the quality of representation is the most important factor.

Arthur Moore

Dr. Arthur Moore has seen many changes take place during his 27 years of association with U of T. Moore retired as President of Victoria College seven years ago at the end of what he calls "a turbulent era" and now, looking back on that period, he says, "a lot of good things came out of it. It's a lot more open university than it used to be."

Moore will be returning to U of T on November 30 in an official capacity when he is installed as Chancellor on November 30th.

As Chancellor, Moore will preside at convocations, confer degrees and act as a liaison with alumni associations. By virtue of his office he will also become an ex-officio member of the Governing Council which he plans to attend regularly "as all the reports will be fed in there."

Moore also intends to take part in some of the debates from time to time. A few of the issues coming up before the Council now are familiar, he said, even after seven years absence from the university. When asked which issues he is referring to, he chuckled and replied: "The need for money and student aid."

"I hope I can be useful," Moore says. "I would like to be available to people, to confer with people."

E. Stewart Lee

"For one who is so active in research and teaching it is quite a big step to devote this kind of time," said Professor E. Stewart Lee of his election to the Governing Council. Lee divides a full teaching load between the Department of Computer Science and the Department of Electrical Engineering, has served on a number of faculty committees and is chairman of the Computer Systems Research Group.

Lee stressed that he does not consider himself "a crusader" and his participation on the Governing Council is motivated by the desire to "find the best way for the university at large."

He is equally matter-of-fact about his concerns as a member of the Planning and Resources Committee and Resources Subcommittee. The real problems of the university lie in the financial areas, he maintained.

The need for immediate action is all the more urgent when one considers that it generally takes from three to four years for financial planning to come to fruition, Lee pointed out. He feels that the budget and the Interim Report of the Planning and Priorities Subcommittee will be the major issue before the Governing Council in the coming year.

The council will also be directing its attention to the five-year review on university government started last spring by Dr. Jack Macdonald. Lee participated in the preparation of a brief submitted to Macdonald by the Association of Engineering Professors which recommends that the Governing Council set policy and "devolve" academic matters to faculty councils.

Presidents aren't important

By GILLIAN O'REILLY

"Do Presidents Matter?" asked Professor Robin Harris in a lecture on U of T's history from 1906 to 1972, held last Thursday at University College. His answer was a qualified "no."

Harris, formerly the first principal of Innis College and now a professor of higher education at U of T, spoke to approximately 50 people the second of two Sesquicentennial lectures on the university's history.

Harris based his thesis that "presidents do not matter" on his belief that the development of U of T has been shaped more by circumstance than by personalities. While he admitted that presidents have played important roles in its development, he pointed out that many other people have done so too, and that trying to designate their order of importance is impossible.

U of T's history, Harris said, has been marked by a series of external events which disrupted affairs and forced adjustments to be made. He cited the two World Wars, the Depression, the massive enrolment of veterans after 1945 and the student activism of the 1960's.

Four men occupied the position of president during these years: R. A. Falconer from 1906 to 1932, H. T. Cody from 1932 to 1945, Sidney Smith from 1945 to 1958 and Claude Bissell from 1958 to 1972. They saw the university grow from a small institution designated as the provincial university to a massive and complex organization which is only one among many Ontario universities.

The period from 1919 to 1930 was very significant in the university's development, according to Harris. The department of graduate studies, the extension services and publicity departments were established, he explained. New professional fields such as nursing and physiotherapy were introduced, the administrative offices were moved from UC to Simcoe Hall and Grade 13 matriculation was made the requirement for admission. In addition Trinity College became part of the St. George campus, Hart House was built and insulins was discovered, furthering interest in research.

These developments resulted in a more unified structure organizationally, geographically and socially, said Harris. However, they also showed the growing diversification of the university's role in research, community affairs and graduate work, although much of this was still in "embryonic form."

The years 1930-50 under Cody and Smith saw the university holding the fort in time of financial stringency through the Depression and World War II. "Genteel poverty" produced a non-expansionist attitude. New buildings were impossible unless they were funded by the occasional private donation.

Claude Bissell, in his memoirs Halfway Up Parnassus, called these years "the feudal age." His own appointment came at the time when the university was re-evaluating its traditional role in the community and in politics and the role of the students in the university.

Size was a major factor in the changes from the mid-1950's to the present, said Harris. The university's population grew astronomically. In 1956, the administration increased enrolment to a mere 20,000; furthermore, Harris related, when he joined the English department in 1952, there were 18 full-time members. In 1971, there were 87.

Harris concluded by saying that while each president performed his job very capably, he felt that none played a decisive role in the overall development of the university. The crucial influences stemmed from national and international circumstances, he said.

Happy Birthday to Gayle

By TED STAUNTON

This is a story about a birthday. The particular birthday in question belongs solely to Gayle Cotton, although for a while she shared it with Fidel Castro. When they split intellectually over concepts of cake decoration, Castro selected his present birth date rather than go to court as he was busy with some missiles.

Why her birthday is the subject of an article is harder to explain. You'll have to read carefully from here on in, because some of the concepts are tricky. There will be a quiz at the end. Looking back will not be allowed.

It began on Saturday afternoon. I was slaving over a hot coffee, trying to get the BBs in the clown's eyes and nose when the phone rang. It was Rob Reid, my attorney. He told me there would be a surprise birthday party for Gayle Cotton that night at Sutton Place.

Obviously I had to pick up some kind of a gift, fast. I called up a friend of mine who gives advice in such matters for ridiculous fees, and we headed out to a nearby shopping mall. Unfortunately, shortly after we arrived, Dave was arrested by a floorwalker for fondling sweatsocks in public.

Left to my own devices I fell back on my innate sense of tact. I bought a small toy gorilla. Brown and furry, as gorillas often are, this one had an amused, worldly air — the look of a gorilla who could appreciate a good five cent cigar.

The Neanderthal at the cash register winked and said "Yeah, it's a gift, right?"

I didn't answer but made a mental note to return and place a hand grenade in the man's nose at the first opportunity. Exiting the store gracefully on a loose roller skate that was lurking underfoot, I somehow managed to upset a large bin of marbles, that had no doubt been placed purposely in my path. Fortunately for me, the Neanderthal lacked my cat-like agility on marbles. He caromed off a stuffed giraffe and landed in the doll houses. The poor fool was trying to extricate his head from a split-level colonial with detached garage as I made my escape.

Having bailed out Dave, I hurried home. I prepared for the delicate operation of removing the price tag from the gorilla. I had just donned my surgical mask and raised the scalpel when a flicker of doubt stirred within me. Perhaps it was indigestion. At any rate, I suddenly became convinced that a gorilla was a ridiculous gift. Granted, it would be tastefully wrapped in a brown paper bag, but still, I was nervous.

"What am I going to do?" I shriled in an unexpected falsetto.

"Well," said the gorilla, "since it's too late to buy anything else, and you've probably put the padlock back on your wallet anyway, why don't you just slip a little note in the card saying you'll do a Varsity story for her birthday?"

Well, time was running out, and I figured that anything that could talk, even with his mouth sewn up like that, had to have something to say.

Our arrival at Sutton Place was delayed because Tim wanted us to pose as narcs and raid a body rub parlour that we passed. Then the doorman attempted to bar our entry merely because Rob had neglected to wear shoes and socks. He changed his mind when Tim, who plays for the Blues, picked him up by the nose.

Despite these setbacks, we arrived in time. Gayle got there just after us, and was surprised by about fifteen people, and everyone laughed, and the band played, and we all danced, and Scott and Zelda jumped in the fountain, and Ernest sipped champagne from Gertrude Stein's slipper, and life was very fine. The band leader crooned "Happy Birthday" to Gayle, and turned on all the light bulbs sewn into his electric blue suit, and finished the evening with a rendition of "Bye, Bye, Blackbird".

Higher fees cut foreign enrolment

(CUP) — A 20.9 per cent drop in the visa student applications last September is due to the differential fee being charged international students at all but two of Ontario's universities, according to the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS).

The Council of Ontario Universities (COU) has revealed that there were only 13,705 applications from visa students this September compared to 17,330 applications the previous year. OFS information officer Alan Golombek said the federation has been actively opposing the differential fee since it was introduced in May 1976 but the COU data is the first real indication they have "of the impact of Ontario differential fees abroad."

Releasing the information at an Oct. 17 press conference, OFS was joined by provincial NDP leader Stephen Lewis and provincial Liberal leader Stuart Smith in calling upon the Conservative government to rescind the fee.

In their protests, all three groups emphasized the changing cultural climate in Ontario universities as a result of the fee. OFS chairperson Miriam Edelson pointed out that "it is not only the books you read and the lectures you attend that form a complete education — but the people you interact with."

OFS has written to the Ontario

Human Rights Commission asking it to investigate the possibility that the fee is in direct contravention of the code which is designed to protect the rights of all people regardless of race, creed, sex or place of origin.

Speaking to the Human Rights Commission, Bromley Armstrong said he believed the fee was a contravention of the spirit of the code but he was not at all certain that it was against any specific regulation in the code.

Both opposition parties explained that even though they had been against the fee since its inception in 1976, they saw little opportunity to bring the matter up for discussion in the legislature. Tuition fees are decreed by regulation of the government and are not controlled by provincial legislation. Smith said that their only opportunity for opposing the fee would be in the budget debate and he warned that the Liberals were not prepared to force an election on this issue alone.

NDP opposition member Dave Warner and Liberal college and university critic John Sweeney pointed out that the government had done no research into differential fees nor did it consult with any of the parties involved in education in Ontario. Warner confessed that after studying the government's action on differential fees he "had not been able to discover where the policy came from."

The government cites the saving to the Canadian taxpayer as its main reason for instituting the fee, yet the education minister admits that actually less than six tenths of one per cent of the total post-secondary education budget might be saved through charging international students more fees. According to the OFS, this represents a saving of less than one dollar per Ontario taxpayer.

This year, all Ontario universities except McMaster and Trent are charging undergraduate fees of $700 for Canadians and $1,500 for visa students, and graduate student fees of $750 for Canadians and $1,950 for visa students. Ontario colleges are charging $325 for Canadians and $700 for international students.

New bi-monthly displays strong commitment to national unity

By RICK BOGACZ

The ranks of Toronto's newspapers were swollen by one when Unity News hit the streets in the third week of September. Labelled as the official voice of Commitment Canada, a citizen's organization working to "strengthen national unity," the newspaper offers news and views every two months about the current confederation crisis in Canada.

Signed members of Commitment Canada were the first to receive the debut issue. The total circulation is 5,000; many copies were also distributed on the city street and on the U of T campus.

The first issue consisted of four pages dealing with topics related to Quebec separatism. Commitment Canada's organizational procedures for the first six months of its existence were also outlined. The paper mentioned to the initial $12,000 of its budget which was funded by a Toronto Dominion Bank branch and by a rally held in Kitchener last June.

Unity News editor Peter Bernard stated that many stories in the September first issue of October had to be "scrounged for" by people involved with Commitment Canada. The articles were also culled from national press releases, he said.

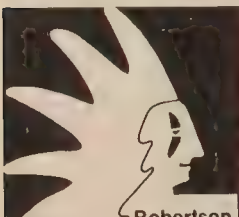

One of the people contributing to the paper is a member of the U of T community, Joan Bryden. Besides writing articles, she is also planning forums to bring together both Quebecois and English-speaking Canadians concerned about national unity. A report regarding these proceedings will be written so that "positive ideas and directions may be offered to those who govern the country."

Bernard hopes that the first copy of Unity News will receive a favorable response and that with additional advertising, citizens reading future publications will become more concerned with this country's status.

The editorial comment made by Commitment Canada's National Chairman Alan Lawley outlines the goals of this organization and its paper. According to Lawley, a major newspaper in the country discussed "current polls suggesting that Canadians are becoming bored with the nationalist issue" and suggested that "it could be difficult to successfully mount a campaign built around a mandate to save the nation." Nonetheless, Lawley wants to attempt to convince Canadians that future events may change the country's appearance both "physically" and politically.

"We alone will be to blame if the ultimate outcome of the problem is the end of Canada as a united nation," he concluded.

Rugger Blues Down But Not Out After Win

The play was rough as the Blues tangled with Western.

By HUGH STUART

Saturday's 20-15 victory over the Western Mustangs was the best game the Rugger Blues have played this season and it could not have come at a better time as it puts the U of T back in the playoff picture.

After the Blues' 16-3 loss to Guelph on Wednesday, coach Neil Sorbie was forced to make wholesale position changes in order to remedy the Blues' problems. Along with the return of Jeff Thomson and Andrew Kryzan, injuries to Gord Kerr, Charlie Singer and Lewis Rose prompted the promotion of Erik Eglite and Karl Heck. These new faces came up big as the score indicates.

For the first time this year the Blues played under favourable weather conditions much to the liking of the Toronto backs who were able to get outside a lot more. Going against the wind, John Gibson's long run put the Blues on the scoreboard first. The convert was missed.

A Western field goal narrowed the count to 4-3. Dave Taylor's try and an Alexiou field goal gave the Blues an 11-3 lead which stood up until scrum half Dave Wortzarn was injured. The injury forced the Blues to play with only 14 men until he recuperated. Western capitalized on his absence, moving into a 12-11 half time lead. They hit on three field goals, one of which went 55 yards.

The second half scoring all resulted from the feet of the kickers, with Alexiou out pointing his Western counterpart 9-3. This gave the Blues the five point margin of victory.

The game was never out of reach for Western and they had the Blues hemmed in their own for the last ten minutes of the game. It took a penalty call by the referee to relieve the pressure after the Mustangs had moved the ball to the Toronto two yard line.

The Mustangs had words of praise for the Blues. As one Western player put it "it was the toughest second half we played this year."

The victory was the most important one of the season in terms of standings. It also marked the first time everything has clicked for the team. As Sorbie stated, "Individually, I don't think that we can be matched, and as you saw out there today, when we play as a team we are very hard to beat."

If the Blues can repeat Saturday's performance in their upcoming games at Queen's and at home against Waterloo, they will have a shot at making the playoffs. Unfortunately, the Blues' two losses this season puts matters out of their hands. Even if they win they must hope that Waterloo or Guelph loses its next two games.

Field Hockey Team Advances

By GLENYS PETERS

The Senior Field Hockey team met their hardest competition to date this weekend and managed to come out on top.

In three closely contested battles they emerged with two victories and a tie. Queen's was a surprise during the first game as they demonstrated commendable determination and energy. U of T was not playing to their capabilities and the game ended as a 1-1 tie on a goal by Carol McDougall.

Coming out to face York, the team was set to take the game to their opposition and stick to what has proved to be an effective game plan. In the second half, the Toronto team came to life and the match ended in a 2-0 victory for the Blues. The placings for the tournament were still far from being decided the next day when McGill was encountered. Again a slow and uncharacteristic first half was followed by an all-out effort in the second half that resulted in three goals.

As the tournament ended, Toronto had five points, McGill and Queen's were tied with three points and York had only one.

Next week-end the ladies play Guelph, Mac, Waterloo and Western. At this point, nothing can be taken for granted and this week will see the team practising harder than ever.

Playing the stronger teams showed quickly what parts of the game needed working on. Coach Hoffman has already planned a series of intense and specialized practices to prepare the team for part II of the tournament next week. Two teams will be going from Ontario to the national finals in Montreal, as well as McGill as the host university. Who the two teams will be is far from being decided. This coming weekend could be a surprise to many teams.

Blues Surrender First Place To Mustangs

By JIM O'LEARY

In a season in which the Blues managed to roll up over 2,300 yards of total offence, their drive for an undefeated first place season was halted by their failure to gain an additional seven yards. In a spirited comeback attempt, the final Blues' drive stalled on the Western seven yard line, allowing the Mustangs to escape with a 19-12 victory in a game played in London on Saturday.

The victory left Western and Toronto tied for first place in the western division of the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference. Western was given first place, however, due to the fact that they defeated Toronto in their only head-on clash.

The outcome of Saturday's game was determined by the Blues' inability to take advantage of Mustang turnovers. If the offence had been hot, Toronto could have salted away the victory in the first quarter. Western's first two drives ended in interceptions by Toronto's Eugene Nakatsu giving the Blues field position deep in Western territory. On both occasions Dan Feraday failed to take the offence to a first down and the Blues had to settle for a single field goal by Mike Sokovnin.

These two interceptions were indicative of the type of game the defence was to have. Time and again the defence came up with key plays which kept the Blues in the game until the final whistle. As well as Nakatsu, Julio Giordani, Bruce Pollock, Angelo Castellani and Robin Rushton turned in sparkling performances.

As has happened throughout the season, the offence did not come to life until the fourth quarter. Against Western however, the deficit was too large to be overcome.

Behind the passing of quarterback Paul Ford who entered the game in the middle of the first quarter to replace the injured Jamie Bone, the Mustangs managed to roll up a 19-3 lead. Ford finished the day with 15 completions in 23 attempts for 207 yards. His favourite receiver was Craig Labett who caught five passes for 120 yards. Bill Rozalowsky also had a big day, gaining 36 yards on five carries and scoring both Western touchdowns. The rest of the Mustang points came off the foot of placekicker Ford.

If there is any consolation in the loss to Western, it is the fact that despite being down by 16 points going into the fourth quarter, the Blues never gave up. Behind the signal calling of Feraday, the offence came close to completing their best comeback of the season.

Toronto's lone touchdown came off a beautifully executed pass and run play between Feraday and receiver Mark Magee. With five minutes left in the game, Feraday hit Magee flying down the sideline with a perfect strike. The play covered 60 yards. Dan Dominico's two point convert made the score 19-12 and set the stage for Toronto's last minute comeback effort.

With two minutes left in the game, Toronto got the ball on the Western 52 yard line. Feraday hit Sam Sinopoli three times and Magee once as he moved the team to the Western seven yard line. On third down and a yard to go, Feraday handed the ball to John Goodrow who was stopped by the Western defence. The failure to get the one yard resulted in Western's getting possession of the ball which allowed them to kill the few seconds remaining on the clock.

SPORTS

As this incomplete pass to Dominico shows, it was a game where Toronto came close but failed to put it all together.

The fact that Chris Kotsopoulos caught only one pass for minus one yard is a telling factor in the Blues' failure to mount a consistent offence. Kotsopoulos received double coverage every time he came to the line of scrimmage making it impossible for him to get open.

Western used five defensive backs throughout the game which made it difficult for Feraday. Feraday hit on only 15 of his 31 pass attempts for 146 yards. Sinopoli was his favourite target, catching five passes for 50 yards.

Goodrow turned in another solid performance, gaining 154 yards of offence on 20 carries and four receptions. He accounted for 84 of Toronto's 95 yards rushing.

Goodrow felt Toronto's failure to put some points on the board when they had the chances in the first quarter was instrumental in their ultimate defeat. "It's frustrating when you get the ball in good field position and can't take it in" he stated. "The defence played really well, it's too bad we couldn't capitalize earlier."

Coach Ron Murphy agreed with Goodrow's assessment but explained that "It's harder to get the offence going early in the game than it is to get the defence going." Overall he was disappointed that the offence took so long to get untracked but thought "we came back very well."

Murphy explains that people tend to forget that Feraday is really only a first year quarterback and is still learning. This will place limitations on the offence until he can learn to read defences better." The loss to Western means that the Blues will face the red-hot Laurier Golden Hawks in first round playoff action next week at Varsity Stadium. In their only encounter this season the Blues defeated the Hawks 17-13 in a closely fought contest.

In Conclusion: The Laurier Golden Hawks clinched third place crushing Guelph 85-21. Windsor overcame a stubborn McMaster squad 27-14 to finish fourth and win the right to meet number one ranked Western in post season play. In a battle of the cellar dwellers Waterloo defeated York 26-7 giving York the dubious distinction of finishing in last place. York has not won a game in two seasons.

Reid Breaks Records

Fullback Jim Reid of the Wilfred Laurier Golden Hawks capped a brilliant season with an outstanding performance as his team trounced the Guelph Grypons 85-21. Reid scored six touchdowns and rushed for 262 yards on his way to an intercollegiate rushing record.

Reid's performance marked the second game in succession he surpassed the 200 yard mark and pushed his season rushing total to a record breaking 1,078 yards. He broke the record of 1,060 set by Ottawa Gee Gee's Mike Murphy last season.

Hockey Blues Win Two

By JIM O'LEARY

It took an overtime goal by Wayne Morrissey to allow the hockey Blues to sweep a two game exhibition series from Michigan State in a tournament played in Michigan over the weekend. Morrissey's goal at the two minute mark of the first overtime period gave the Blues a 4-3 come-from-behind victory.

The Blues entered the third period trailing Michigan 3-2. A goal by Morrissey tied the score and sent the game into overtime.

In the first game of the weekend series, the Blues overcame poor officiating to take a 3-1 victory. They got great goaltending from Jenner to pace them to the win.

After the first exhibition game against Whitby there was some concern about the Blues' defensive play. If this weekend is any indication those worries were ill-founded.

Coach Tom Watt was very pleased with the defensive play of his team. Jenner and Logan gave the team great goaltending while the rest of the team played much more effectively in their own end. According to Watt he "couldn't ask for anything more from the team, especially the way they played defensively."

An added bonus of this trip was the extra practice the Blues got penalty killing. Over the two games the Blues were forced to play shorthanded 21 times. By comparison the Michigan team was only shorthanded seven times. The Blues were equal to the task, however, allowing only two goals by Michigan's power play.

As can be expected, Toronto's power play excelled, as they scored on three of their seven chances. In their two exhibition games to date they have scored on fifty percent of their power play opportunities.

The trip may prove to be costly for the Blues in that several key players sustained injuries. Lance Gattoni and Gary Farelli were felled by knee injuries. In Farelli's case it was the same knee he had surgery on last year. The full extent of their injuries was not known at press time. Snelinger suffered a dislocated shoulder when he was run into the boards. Snelinger is also coming off surgery to both his shoulders which causes added concern about his latest injury. Bob Adoranti suffered a broken nose but is not expected to miss any action.

Despite the two wins the series had a discouraging note for Watt and his players. In the two games in Michigan they played before sellout crowds of 6,000. This is discouraging because the Blues know that it will be a long time before they see another crowd of that size. In Toronto only the most faithful have been attending games in recent years.

"It was great to play before some fans for a change," said Watt in describing their reception in Michigan. "It's discouraging to me and the players though, that they can get 6,000 out to a game and we can't draw peanuts." The reason Toronto doesn't draw for home games according to Watt is that very little promotion is done. At Michigan "they sell their sports programs to the students," Watt stated.

By JIM O'LEARY

Led by record breaking performances by Jill Ross and Rolo Demarchi, the U of T track and field team placed second in the annual Ontario Universities Athletic Association track and field meet. This year's meet, which was held at McMaster University was won by a strong team from Queen's. Queen's victory marked the first time in five years that U of T failed to bring home the top prize.

Coach Andy Higgins feels it was a combination of a strong Queen's team and a weaker than usual Toronto squad which caused Toronto to slip from the top spot. Toronto, he feels, was weak in the men's sprints and the throwing events.

Injuries and graduation hit Toronto runners this year, making it difficult to keep up with Queen's. In the 400 metre race this weakness was particularly apparent as Queen's runners captured the top three spots.

Toronto throwers are at a disadvantage according to Higgins because they do not have a proper place to train. Both Javelin and discus require large open areas which are not to be found on the crowded St. George Campus. By comparison, Higgins points out that in throwing events Toronto captured only 3 points whereas they scored 44 points in the jumping events where adequate training facilities are provided.

The Toronto team was paced by several outstanding performances from both the men and women. Leading the list is Jill Ross. Ross captured four first place finishes and broke an OUAA record in the process. Her time of 56.0 in the 400 metres bettered the old mark of 56.4. Her other ribbons came in the 100 metre hurdles, long jump and the 400 metre relay.

Pacing the men's team was Rolo Demarchi whose record-breaking high jump earned him the Hec Phillips award as the outstanding performer of the meet. Demarchi led a high jumping team which swept the top three spots. Carl Georgeuski placed second while Rob Pitters earned the third place spot.

According to Higgins the best effort of the meet was turned in by Jon Ireland who placed first in the 400 metre hurdles despite running with a painful hamstring pull. Higgins said "it was just an incredible effort." The injury had prevented Higgins from practising for the past ten days. On Saturday he further aggravated the injury in a preliminary heat. According to Higgins, he wrapped up his leg and came back to win the final 40 minutes later.

Toronto did well in the pole vault, capturing three of the top four spots. Tom Wornd placed first while Bob Hart and Mark Watling placed third and fourth respectively.

Mike Hart was another big winner capturing first place in the 110 metre hurdles, second in the 400 metre hurdles as well as his third in the pole vault.

For the women good performances were turned in by Jean Sparling who won the 200 metre, Anne Perkin who placed third in both the 200 metre and the long jump and Joanna Barker who placed third in the gruelling 3,000 metre race.

Next week the cross country team travels to Kingston for the OUAA championships. Higgins expects the toughest opposition to come from the Queen's team which is always ready for major events.

Mike Hart shows the form which led him to victory in the 110 metre hurdles. Hart also placed second in the 400 metre hurdles and third in the pole vault.

Invention intended to ease life of diabetics

By SELWYN FIRTH

What may be the most exciting discovery for the millions of insulin-using diabetics since the discovery of insulin itself at U of T some 55 years ago by Sir Frederick Banting and Charles Best has been made. Spokesmen for Connaught Laboratories of Toronto said an artificial endocrine pancreas has been developed in their labs under the supervision of Dr. Anthony Sun, an honorary Lecturer in U of T's Department of Physiology.

The device has recently been successfully tested on small monkeys, spokesmen said. However, more testing and research must be done before human experimentation can be attempted.

In an interview with Sun, it was disclosed that the small implantable device has only been attached to monkeys for periods of up to three days, but that the device operated successfully for over 200 days when coupled to a machine.

This is a breakthrough for research, according to Sun, since one of his major problems has been the inability to culture the tissue component in such a device for long periods of time.

Sun's device is a small plastic tubular container. Approximately 20,000 Islets of Langerhans (the tissue component) obtained from rat pancreata are placed in the container. When the device is hooked up to a vein, blood flows through a porous tube — which allows free diffusion of nutrients and insulin produced by the islets but keeps the larger antibody molecules from destroying them. (An islet is a small cluster of cells some of which produce insulin.) What makes his device an incredible achievement, said Sun, is that it allows foreign tissue to survive in a hostile environment and at the same time produce a beneficial product for its host.

Sun noted that when the artificial pancreas is attached to a monkey, the pancreas is able to effect a return to normal blood sugar levels from two to three times the normal levels in a matter of 10 to 15 minutes. These levels remain normal for the duration of the experiment.

There are still many problems for

Sun to solve in the immediate future, he said. Since the monkeys weigh only about seven pounds and the average human weighs from 15 to 30 times this much, it will take a proportionate increase in the number of islets required to "seed" the device. Another problem is that blood clots as it passes through the device. The clotting is a reaction to the material used to make the device and once a better material is found, this should be solved, stated Sun.

When these and other problems are solved, Sun's device may become a reality for humans. But because of the numerous variables in his research, Sun was unable to estimate when it would be available for humans.

As a result of his breakthroughs in islet research, Sun has been invited to attend a symposium sponsored by the National Institute of Health at Bethesda, Maryland on November 29.

At present it costs from $3-$4,000 for each experiment involving a monkey. It is to be hoped that techniques for mass production can reduce this cost, said Sun.

Millett wants leadership movement

About 500 women and at least one man gathered in Convocation Hall Tuesday night to listen to Kate Millett, who Time magazine once deemed "the leading theoretician of the North American feminist movement." She was speaking on "The Leadership Crisis In The Women's Movement," the first of three topics in the Women's Fund Raising Coalition Series on the Evolving Woman.

Millett began by disclaiming the very idea of leadership. She termed it an "ideal imposed from above and below." She pointed out that leaders bring with them a sterile institution of "generals, lieutenants, and so forth." Millett felt that "most leaders do not do work, they just tell other people what to do." She said that the women's movement should be directed in a "group kind of way" and compared her anti-organizational approach to the women's movement to the historical tactic of "befuddling the enemy."

She claimed that "we are not real anarchists," but "in comparison to other groups we are enormously loose and open." Yet, when pointed out to her that most successful American social reform groups have been carefully organized, she responded that the movement's failure to have some of their long? "... it's only one sentence you know."

Millett perceives the real crisis in the women's movement as the possibility that the U.S. Senators would "sell out," because they are terrified of the right" (wing political movement.) She discussed the efforts of right-wing groups such as the Ku Klux Klan, the John Birch Society and the Right-to-Lifers, who are making a "last-ditch stand" on the part of the "patriarchal tradition."

Women in these groups are "turned into soldier robots" and "made into an army to defend their cowardly men," said Millett. She said they are instruments for "fascist tactics," and "bizarre manipulation" of voting at state conventions to elect representatives of the women's movement in Washington. These "robot-women" are armed with "every kind of technology"; Millett averred that they even had walkie-talkies and were backed up by teams of "public relations men, pollsters, and market research men." She complained that these women often disrupted meetings by breaking into tears and screams over such issues as abortion.

Millett warned that this "infiltration by the right" is how the Nazi Party took over. As a result of their "slick tactics," Millett said, right-wing groups comprise 10-25 per cent of the women's delegation. One delegate is the wife of a Grand Poobah in the Ku Klux Klan, she said.

Millett claimed these groups "are trying to make it like yesterday ... but they can't." Their desire to preserve the "sacredness of the home," may mean an anti-abortion bill and a blocking of the Equal Rights Amendment, Millett said.

Millett stressed that the "real roots of our oppression are that we get beaten up and raped." She spoke of the "rampant murders of women" and their fear "to go out into the street."

Millett's upcoming book is about the torture and murder of a sixteen-year-old girl who had been imprisoned for weeks in a basement. Millett said she was "obsessed by this great indignity, and what it means." She plans to draw an analogy between this story and the physical subjugation of women in general.

In Sita, Millett wrote about her love affair with another woman. At the seminar she said she did not see why she should be restricted from loving "one half of the human race." She stated that "people's lives are ruined" by gay oppression; they "lose their worthiness as human beings" in the eyes of society. She saw the restriction of bisexuality as the "basis of the patriarchal tradition," and feared that the advocates of this "tradition" are going to employ the state to oppress others.

Millett said she is very optimistic about the status of women's liberation today. At this time in history, she said, "I would not want to be anything but a woman." She pointed out that there has been a "real transformation of values" and the creation of a women's culture. For the first time, she said, women can see themselves politically as a group.

Ironically, Millett, who advocates a decentralized and loosely organized Women's Movement, was told by a spectator that she is a natural leader and "breathes fire into our ideals."

Transit fare increase criticized

By PHILIP LIBMAN

By a vote of 8-3, Metro Executive Committee decided Tuesday to recommend to Metro Council to raise TTC fares, thereby disagreeing with the voices of over 12 deputations that spoke against the raise.

The major point of most of the deputations was that the people who could least afford the increase would be most hurt. But the committee, in the spirit of "user pays," voted to increase the cost of tokens and tickets from 40c to 43c for adults, with cash fare rising from 50c to 55c.

A group of University of Toronto students in urban studies presented a deputation. Vince Borg, group chairman, spoke eloquently about the need to recognize the TTC as a "hard service" in the same category as hydro and water. (A "soft service" in municipal politics parlance is one where the capital expenditure is very low, with most of the money going to salaries.)

"A well-used TTC is vital to the well-being of urban life," Borg said. "By the TTC's own figures, ridership will drop by 5.9 million passengers if the fares go up. This will cause more people to use their cars, and further congest our roads, something we are all trying to avoid."

Borg also emphasized the basic unfairness of the increase, pointing to an added increase of approximately $30 for the average transit-using family, based on one adult and two students.

"The TTC bureaucrats response to the deficit has been to recommend raising fares. We propose other alternatives. These include making the province honor its 1974 commitment to maintain municipal grants at the same increase level as provincial revenues. Because it hasn't, municipalities have been deprived of $111 million. And the federal government has not lived up to its promise of 1974 to fund urban transportation," Borg said.

"We recommend that on an experimental basis fares be reduced during off-peak hours to encourage ridership, and the use of staggered hours."

He also suggested that a one-mill rate increase would raise property taxes by $7, and thereby spread the share among all Metro residents."

This last point received much comment. Aldermen Dick Gilbert, Anne Johnston and Janet Howard said their residents would favor the tax increase over the fare increase. The city representatives on council, except for Fred Beavis, voted against the increase, while the suburbanites, complained about the tax increase and voted to increase the burden of transportation on those for whom "the TTC is the only mode of getting around to and from work and about town," in Borg's words.

Meanwhile the Students Administrative Council (SAC) is taking action on the fare increase. "We have put together a brief, which will be submitted to Metro Council, recommending lower fares for university students. The brief is based on the logic that there is a demonstrated extra need among university students for lower fares, the same need that exists among high school students," said Mark McElwain, deputy External Affairs Commissioner, and SAC rep from Knox College.

SAC Vice-President Brian Hill attended a meeting last night to discuss the fare increase, said John Doherty, External Affairs Commissioner. The meeting will "line up strategy" when Metro Council meets next Tuesday at two o'clock to discuss the proposal.

"SAC has proposed a monthly pass for university students, according to Mark McElwain. "We thought that we would be the ideal control group, as we knew that the TTC would be looking into this proposal. Unfortunately during the last couple of weeks, the TTC has destroyed most of that idea."

"I believe that our chances at getting the reduced fare are very good," said McElwain.

Organization seeks your blood terror grips several faculties

The competition is not just academic at U of T - beginning on Monday, the Red Cross will kick off its annual fall blood donor clinic. Held in the front lobby of the Medical Sciences Building in King's College Circle, the drive will attempt to reach its goal of 2,000 units of blood.

The challenges have been taken up by various U of T faculties which have indicated their choice of adversary for the most pints of blood. As of press time, the more provocative combinations included Architecture versus Music, Education versus Graduate Studies and Faculty versus Administration.

Opening ceremonies will be held 9:30 a.m. Monday morning in front of the Medical Sciences building. An actual "kick-off" will take place, Red Cross spokesmen said. In addition, Radio station Q107 will be announcing the results of these competitions daily.

The blood donor clinic will last from Monday to Friday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m., and Thursday from 10 a.m. to 6:30 p.m.

UTFA offshoot seeks identity: joins the fight against cutbacks

By CONNIE FILLETTI

Cutbacks will be a major issue before the Faculty Reform Caucus (FRC), an unofficial association of "progressive" U of T faculty which views itself as an alternative to the University of Toronto Faculty Association (UTFA).

FRC coordinator Peter Fitting said the fight against cutbacks is not limited to aiding only faculty with salary disputes. He stated cutbacks in every dimension concerning both faculty and students are a problem.

Fitting also expressed FRC concern with how U of T is working. "Like UTFA we are concerned with the sense of disgust on campus towards bureaucracy and trivia committees like Governing Council deals with. We are concerned with more faculty voice at the expense of administrators. Unlike the faculty association we want to see a breakdown of organized divisions."

Fittings said a Committee to Reform U of T "might be an important thing to work for." He stated the potential committee would comprise students and faculty concerned with the university's relationship to the surrounding community.

The U of T Committee for Disarmament and the Canadian Inquiry into Human Rights in Chile are two ongoing issues various FRC members are involved in, according to Fitting.

He sees no conflict between these individual involvements and membership in the FRC. Fitting said the caucus mailing list of over 100 names is available to members "to make people aware" of issues not directly emanating from the FRC.

Among the main activities of the caucus are responding to campus issues via public statements, public meetings and telephone campaigns relating to specific issues and organizing around issues that arise, claims Fitting.

He said an ongoing theme of the FRC is expansion of the organization and establishing an identity beyond UTFA. However, Fitting stressed that the most important aim of the caucus is to try to avoid a polarization of faculty and students.

Forestry meeting

By BLAIR HUNTER

The expected statement from the Faculty of Forestry and Landscape did not materialize at Wednesday's meeting of the Subcommittee on Curriculum and Standards.

Dean Vidar Nordin was unable to attend and the discussion of his Faculty's Annual Curriculum Report for 1977-78 must be put off until the next meeting on November 9.

After the subcommittee's last meeting on October 12, a set of questions concerning curriculum changes, academic regulations and other miscellaneous items was sent to Nordin's office.

"The November 9 meeting will deal with the Forestry report in some form, the actual report may not be ready... but questions will be directed to Nordin," explained subcommittee chairman Henry Auster.

Now that the proposal of the Forestry students and professors to do away with their course weighting system is before the faculty's curriculum committee pending decision, some of the fire has been taken out of the issue.

The subcommittee is now faced with the precedents that may or may not have been established in the realm of curriculum regarding the use of Summer Authority by the Vice-Provost's office.

"The Faculty of Forestry case stands out," Auster said. "While Summer Authority is a general policy, it seems it should not have been invoked in this case."

Committee member David Rosenbaum stated that "a report of the subcommittee should be necessary when large curricular changes that affect students appear, as in the Forestry case."

The subcommittee also discussed the cyclical review of divisional curricular practices that is expected to begin in 1977-78.

Some dissension was voiced concerning the timetabling of certain divisional reviews in that it did not match other major reviews planned to take place. For example, the Applied Sciences and Engineering Faculty is up for its periodic review from an outside accrediting institution next year, but the subcommittee has it at the top of the list for this year's review.

Without reaching a final decision the subcommittee agreed that some flexibility may be allowed in determining placement for the first cycle of review, but from that point forward the period would remain constant.

Kamera Klicks Kontest

Here is the first winner of the Varg Kamera Klicks Kontest. It was taken by Alden Globe on an Outdoor Club "expedition". For many, this photograph may represent the struggle to find a job before or after graduating. To others it may only be a symbolization of the long road to an ultimate goal. To others still it may just be plain fun! Our congratulations go out to Alden for his fine effort, and to the others who entered the contest, good luck in the final. Remember, all entries are automatically entered in the final. If you didn't get a photo in this week, there are four more contests to go. Watch the paper for further details.

Experts scrutinize Polar pipeline proposal

By SEAN DUNPHY

The proposed Polar Gas pipeline was condemned and an exhaustive inquiry into all aspects of Northern development was called for at a forum titled "The Ontario North Today" attended by 150 people at the St. Lawrence Centre on Wednesday night.

The Polar Gas Corporation is proposing to build a 2,300 mile long pipeline from Melville Island in the Northwest Territories through northern Manitoba and Ontario to hook up with the Trans-Canada Pipeline. The pipeline would tap the natural gas fields off Melville Island as well as several smaller fields off surrounding islands. It is presently estimated to cost between $10 and $15 billion.

The panelists included both Inuit and Indian representatives as well as environmental experts on the North. Polar Gas declined to attend the forum, saying that it did not want to "preempt or undermine the public review process" (referring to the investigations carried out by government agencies whose approval will be needed to order to build the pipeline) by attending a public discussion. However, panelists took exception to these grounds saying that the public review process is too narrow to properly deal with the issues. The National Energy Board (NEB) does not look at alternatives to proposals put before it, nor does it help finance groups wishing to oppose the proposals according to Jan Mc-Pherson, a York University graduate student in environmental studies.

McPherson noted that the proposed pipeline route runs through ecologically delicate areas including three areas which are on the International Biological Convention's list of regions to be preserved. She expressed concern that not only the possibility of a major spill arising from the unique technological problems (including straits of up to 35 miles in width and 1,000 feet in depth under which a pipeline will have to be buried due to the ice conditions) threatens the northern environment, but also the damage from blasting in permafrost, dumping of raw sewage in rivers, and the building of roads during the actual construction.

Fred Plain of the Grand Council Treaty No. 9 insisted that native peoples be consulted on all development in the North. They only want, he said, to be consulted as equals. He asked if natural gas was so vital a need in Canada "right at the moment, that the pipeline must immediately be built."

Eric Togoona of the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada said the government seems to be looking at pipelines only in terms of jobs for northerners. He said that since the Inuit people would be "engulfed" if the pipelines are all built, asking a native to take a job on the pipeline "is like asking a condemned man to take a job in a rope factory." He said that gas reserves in Western Canada will hold us until a full inquiry can be made into both the pipeline and alternatives.

Dr. Bob Page of the Committee for an Independent Canada and Francois Bregba, an environmental analyst pointed out that according to the government, Alberta has enough gas to supply the country and keep up export commitments until the end of the 1980's. Bregba said that no Canadian market would be available for Melville Island gas, necessitating almost all of the gas coming through the proposed line being exported to the United States. He said the argument that the gas could be used instead of oil was false because the gas would be more expensive than Arab oil, and this oil is only being used east of Montreal.

Page added that the line is being demanded on the basis of insufficient reserves to warrant the construction of such a massive pipeline. According to Polar Gas officials, he said, reserves of 20 to 40 trillion cubic feet (t.c.f.) of gas are needed to justify construction. Polar Gas has been drilling for more than 10 years and has discovered nothing since 1973. He described proven reserves as "the biggest numbers racket in North America," and Polar Gas is no exception. Page suggested that the haste with which Polar Gas seems to be pushing for this pipeline was probably due to possible competition from proponents of a liquefied natural gas tanker route.

All members seemed to agree that an inquiry is needed to look not only at the pipeline, but at the cumulative effects of all northern development on the environment and culture in the north. This would include Reed Papers' proposed development which is presently being investigated by the provincial Hartt Commission.

Hertzberg on Spinoza

By CHARLES MEISTER

The father of Jewish modernity is the eighteenth century philosopher Spinoza, said Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg in a seminar entitled "Spinoza and the Emergence of the Modern Jew". Hertzberg, a History professor at Columbia and president of the American Jewish Congress, was speaking at University College last Monday.

Spinoza is accorded this status, according to Hertzberg's thesis, for having rejected "the actual root of Judaism." The essence of what Spinoza proposes, stated Hertzberg, is that man and the universe are part of a "rational order of things," and any man, through this understanding, can attain ethical universality, he said. He wanted to destroy the "we" and reach the "I" universality, said Hertzberg. Therefore Spinoza is "essentially antisocial... looking down on the commonality of man." Civil order pales for Spinoza in comparison to the universal immutable truths available to human reason, Hertzberg stated.

Hertzberg described Spinoza as "the arch-heretic". Spinoza denies revelation for he views it as "what pure reason reaches when it is uncluttered" by tradition, background, and upbringing. Furthermore, the Bible is a political and theological treatise for Spinoza. He acts as judge of the morality portrayed in the Bible.

Hertzberg also emphasizes the "Spinozistic" denial of history. Since our ancestors had rude, partial ideas, history is not teaching but simply "error". Hertzberg further observed how Jewish studies over the centuries have been evolving toward Spinoza's ideal. In the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries Talmudic learning was preferred. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the orientation was theological. Now Jewish studies have, of necessity, become historical, he concluded.

Letters & Opinions

Deep thanks

May I use a brief space in your correspondence department to express my deep thanks and appreciation to the two young people who came to my rescue on Charles Street last Friday morning (Oct. 21). Having seen me trip over an uneven paving stone in front of Wymilwood, they rushed from opposite directions to pick me up, mop me up, and accompany me, one driving, to the Emergency Department of the Women's College Hospital. Their generous use of time and sympathy made a very trying experience much less painful than it might otherwise have been. If either of them reads this, I wish he or she would get in touch with me so that I can thank them more personally.

Tenure denied

Regarding the article "Former professor wonders why tenure not granted" in the Friday, Oct. 7 Varsity:

As former students of Stuart Niermeier we express our regret at his being relieved of his position. His method of instruction, being informative, provocative, and witty, brought a freshness to the study of English Literature. We consider him to be a superlative educator, whose removal can only constitute a deficit to the U of T community. Though the situation may be irreversible, our conviction is not.

UT press clean

The report on the discussions of the University of Toronto Press' annual statement by the Business Affairs Committee (The Varsity, October 21, 1977) gives the erroneous impression that the Press not only edits the publications which appear under its imprint but also its financial statements.

Like any other business, the Press has to borrow money for its working capital. It therefore has outstanding bank loans as well as loans from the University. On these loans, the Press pays full interest, and the amount of $124,479 shown in the Press's audited financial statement is the net interest paid by the Press to the bank and to the University during its financial year ended April 30, 1977. The amount of $44,683 to which this amount is compared is not a budget figure (as stated in your report), but the actual interest accrued to the Press's publishing and printing division. The balance of $79,796 is, in fact, a crosscharge to the Bookstores of interest to cover the loan necessary to finance the substantial inventories which must be carried by the Bookstores at all times.

Even though the Bookstores are a department of the Press, they are operated as if they were a separate division of the University. Completely separate statements for the Bookstores are prepared monthly and have in the past been shared with the Bookstores Users Committee and members of the SAC executive. They continue to be available for inspection to anyone who wishes to review them. Under the ruling of the then Board of Governors of the University, the Bookstores are charged to operate on a break-even basis with full accountability of all expenses. Financing costs for inventory and equipment are as much part of the costs of a business operation as are salaries and rent.

The Press is fully accountable to the University administration, its auditors and the Governing Council. It has no objection to presenting the financial statements for the Bookstores separate from those for the publishing and printing division. And it has nothing to hide.

Terror irrational

In Mario Cutajar's recent response to those critical of his views on terrorism and its justification one statement made is undoubtedly true: "Paradox is paradox." As for the rest of what he has to tell us, little makes sense and even less is true. Consider his remarks on reason:

"Reason by itself does not justify anything, it merely demystifies. Despite our naive expectation that life is a series of revolvable moral problems it demonstrates that the only consistent feature of life is paradox. Reason ruthlessly exposes the choices open to us without demonstrating that one choice is better than another."

But clearly reason does justify some actions and refuses justification to others. One of these "others" is terrorism. The question of whether terrorism is morally right or wrong is in fact one which can be answered. In other words, it is a "resolvable moral problem". Reason does much more than expose the choices open to us; it demonstrates that one is better than another. Terrorism in all its various and disgusting instances is wrong, be it the terrorism of the IRA or the PLO or even the Israelis in founding the nation of Israel. Any attempt to hold the position of Cutajar — that acts of terrorism are themselves neither justified nor unjustified (neither right nor wrong) but rather await the verdict of history —

results in the complete renunciation of truth as anything more than the hurrahs and boos of a bunch of imbeciles. The Nazi torture and killing of Jews and Christians was either right or wrong. If I maintain it was wrong, then my statement is either true or false. Nothing which happens in the future will change this. My statement is either true or false — not both depending on the moment in history. So too for the Nazi atrocities: they were, are and forever will be wrong. Consequences are not the proper measure of the rightness or wrongness or some action — the action itself is either right or wrong, then, now and forever. To maintain that "Whether our reasons for doing something were good or bad can only be decided after we have acted" and that our actions can be judged right or wrong only from some future point in history is not only self-refuting and self-contradictory — it is also wrong, now and forever in the future. Think about it. Here reason justifies; it "demonstrates".

Murder, be it on behalf of oppressed masses or for the sake of a wealthy few, is wrong. The act of murder itself is wrong and no appeal to consequences, immediate or future, can be made to change it into something right. Murder is not right yesterday, wrong today and perhaps right again tomorrow; it is now and forever wrong. Think about it; it's like truth.

Competition makes capitalism humane

It was with considerable interest that I read in last Monday's Varsity the criticisms of Mario Cutajar's opinions on terrorism, and Mr. Cutajar's rebuttal to these charges. He is obviously able to defend his viewpoints articulately.

However, his entire argument rests upon one sentence, which is the weak point of his whole article. That is, "A genuine humanist today would be irreconcilably opposed to capitalism". This statement is tossed out as if it were a truism, whereas it certainly is not. A genuine humanist is concerned with human welfare as a whole, now and in the future. Thus, a society which will facilitate the improvement of the general human condition is his ideal.

The founding principle of capitalism is competition, a principle which has invariably been the basis of life's existence and development for the three billion years since the first protoplasm was formed. This principle has guided the improvement and development of life, culminating in the evolution of Homo sapiens. It is difficult to see why this highly successful principle should now be abandoned, when no superior system has been shown to exist. This is not to say some adjustment is not necessary — indeed, the concepts of welfare, unemployment insurance, and other social benefits are most necessary at the present time in order to rectify some of the shortcomings which do exist in this system. There is, however, no justification for the attempted overthrow of the entire democratic capitalist system, especially by use of the obscene methods of terrorism. There is no reasonable goal to be accomplished by this effort.

The letters of Steve Anderson and Jeff Buckstein, which Cutajar dismisses so lightly, do indeed illustrate this point. There exists no society which better serves the welfare of the human being today than a basically capitalist, democratic one such as that of Canada. Certainly Marxist societies are much inferior in this respect (as pointed out by Buckstein), and nobody can seem to suggest a workable alternative system which is actually superior. It is senseless to destroy a way of life in order to make mankind suffer under an inferior system.

In conclusion, the use of terrorism is not reasonable or understandable as suggested by Cutajar, because there is nothing to be gained by its use. No paradox exists, because the act of harming those innocents you claim to be defending will not improve their lot. I have not sold my conscience away — I believe that capitalism is the most humanistic system that exists, in that it embodies the basic principle of competition, the essence of improvement, as modified and guided by the democratic process. Terrorism, as pointed out by Stephen Watson, is practiced primarily by the insane, confused, or malevolent, not those with an improvement of the human condition in mind. Significantly, Mr. Cutajar did not or could not refute this point.

Urban Gorilla alright

In the October 21, 1977 edition of the Varsity two students expressed their disapproval of not only "Urban Gorilla's" behaviour but also of his very right to exist. Furthermore, they threatened that unless "Urban Gorilla's" existence were terminated they would order Orca the killer whale to somehow sabotage a typewriter. The protesters claimed that "Urban Gorilla" was "the most amateurish piece of putridified dung (they had) ever seen in black and white".

I think this type of comparison may be a bit unfair because most students are probably not familiar enough with putridified dung to be in a position to appreciate such comparisons. I personally was unaware that black and white putridified dung existed.

The objectors stated that they are students at the "U. of Tedium". I for one have never heard of the "U. of Tedium" but apparently it has a newspaper much like ours that also includes "Urban Gorilla". The protesters suggested that a column about transcendental granola appreciation in the place of "Urban Gorilla" would be more in keeping with the desires and wishes of the student population. They did not specify whether or not transcendental granola appreciation was related to popular course material at "U. of Tedium". In any case, they will probably have a problem on their hands at the U. of Tedium if there are some students who enjoy the antics of "Urban Gorilla". Publishing two separate editions of their University newspaper (one with "Urban Gorilla" and one without) would probably be too impractical a solution. Perhaps those students who object to "Urban Gorilla" might simply ignore him (though they might be advised to think twice if it is recommended reading). This would still allow others to follow his adventures. If this solution is unacceptable then the University of Toronto may, if requested to do so, volunteer a special task force of expert troubleshooters in order to help the University of Tedium solve this pressing problem.

It is not clear to me whether the objectors intended their letter to arrive at Varsity headquarters or whether they wanted it published in their own university newspaper. In any case, if they were actually trying to draw attention to their plight and were hoping to receive advice, I feel they could not have picked a better place to send their notice.

"If you're fed up, the answer is to tear your clothing, act like a Troglodyte, and engage in stupid violence and brutal sex."

Eric McMillan as quoted in Prolegomena to Western Art.

Thanks this week to all those who sidelined the real rebellion, obscured the student movement and generally retarded the inevitable advance of History, and instead put out this issue. Included in this "anti-people" bunch "which resurrects the absolute worst of past decaying cultures", are Daryl Pipa, Arthur Kaptainis, B. J. DelConte, Jeanne Johnson, Neil Michael Davidson, Paul Budra and Kim Michasiw.

We "are not going to fall for this manipulation." Kinda.

No Innis meeting this week, but come to the staff meeting today at 2:00.

Rasky's Chagall film: an antidote to the pornography of the mind

"Chagall is the youngest man I've ever met and also one of the sexiest", says Harry Rasky, whose film, Homage to Chagall, opened this week at the Sheraton Centre. But this is only one reason for his interest in the 90 year old master painter. He is obsessed with the spiritual achievement and dynamic energy of cultural heroes such as Chagall, and he seems to live vicariously through them.

Swimming against the mainstream of celluloid "pornography of the mind", Rasky has launched this film to offer a more positive view of life, one which he feels has been sorely neglected in modern cinema. Consequently, he strictly avoids subjects dealing with the dark side of the human spirit. Peter Watkins's film documentary on Edvard Munch would be considered anathema. It is perhaps in this that the value of the film lies — as a conscientious objector offering an alternative, polished view of man.

With Scenes from a Marriage, Rasky's film is one of the few made-for-TV documentaries to make it to the screen. And it was no easy task convincing CBC to allow the film, which took $200,000 and two years to make, to slip out into the big world. But Rasky's patient persistence, and encouragement from New York art critics finally paid off.

Homage to Chagall is not an art film, in Rasky's estimation. It's a moving mural, which on a full-size screen has the effect of surrounding you with colour and sound. For ninety minutes, Rasky wants you to bask in Chagall's mysticism. Clinically academic, it is not, though it has been widely acclaimed as the definitive study on Chagall.

Rasky has already taken the film to American centres. New York loved it. Washington complained that the approach was too loving. Television audiences responded well in the spring of this year when it was presented on CBC. It has been nominated for an International Emmy and Rasky's office is cluttered with various awards. All of which suggests a generally positive response.

But what does Chagall think? The artist did not see the film until it was completed in March. Rasky says Chagall was on the point of tears during the screening, warmly embraced him afterwards, and claimed that it was a work of great love and perfection. He said "Your film will help me live longer, not less".

But, being the artist that he is, Chagall suggested that the film could be trimmed in places. And Rasky, being the artist that he is, turned to look at a painting of the Eiffel Tower by Chagall on the wall of his villa in Venice and asked coyly "Where would you trim that?" The artists' draw.

For a film without actors, the film is very complex in its orchestration of elements. Much of the script is actually Chagall's poetry, read by James Mason whom Rasky chose for the musicality of his voice. However, the musical score (by Lou Applebaum and the Toronto Symphony Orchestra) incorporates snatches of Mozart, Russian folk music, and some Rumanian (a small compromise). Combined with narration also by Mason, panorama shots of the paintings, and interview with Chagall in French, the movie is a satisfying experience. Rasky admitted that, for himself, it is definitely more satisfying than anything he's done in this vein.

Like so many other illustrious Canadians,

Harry Rasky: film producer cum impresario.

Rasky was once an important arm of the Varsity, during his university years. By combining journalism with entertainment (he produced the '49 UC Follies), Rasky built the foundation for a career in the media. After working for Lord Thompson's Daily News at $27 a week, he decided that Northern Ontario was "no place for a Jewish boy", and returned to Toronto. Newspaper positions as now were pie in the sky, so he turned to radio. A sojourn at CHUM led to striking a bonanza at CKEY as a ghost writer for Lorne Green's news commentary. He then moved into experimental radio documentaries where he earned a reputable name.

This was good preparation for the advent of television in 1952, when he, Norman Jewison and "the gang" were breaking open the new medium. News magazine on CBC was first produced by Rasky, but was only a stepping stone to freelance work in Europe and a stint in the States working for the various networks.

1972 brought Rasky back to Canada and CBC where he produces approximately one documentary a year. He's now hoping to put together a programme on Lillian Hellman, that is, if she lets him.

I often maintain that the office is the measure of the man and Rasky's office maintains a homey cluttered effect. This is probably due to the splash of stills and photos of his films or himself amidst entertainment society. A photograph of the young Hemingway in a striking pose, with one corner bearing a penned New Year's greeting signed 'Earnest', immediately caught my eye. Rasky chuckled — it was merely a joke from a friend.

Nevertheless, Harry Rasky has been welcomed into the ranks of some of the greatest film-makers and literati, and can be counted on for significant work in the future. I see nothing wrong with that work being "too loving" in its treatment of the subject. How can we discount a 90 year old painter who works 12 hours a day, while his assistants take breathers?

Marc Chagall: ninety years old, sexy (very famous) lives longer with Celluloid!

Equus: stage whinn, screen scratch

On June 7th 1956, in the New York Post, Ethel Barrymore, the legendary American actress, wrote: "There is as much difference between the stage and the films as between a piano and a violin. Normally, you can't become a virtuoso in both." Peter Shaffer is a case in point. His stage play, Equus, currently playing at the Hamilton Place Studio in a production by Theatre Aquarius, is deservedly, one of the most lauded plays in theatrical history. The Equus play provides an intelligent vehicle for thoroughly gripping theatrical spectacles. Shaffer's screen-play of Equus, however, only succeeds in showing the weaknesses of his stage version and his obvious dependence on John Dexter, the original director.

In the original stage presentation the audience was forced to use their imaginative powers. For many who had been brought up on television, and predominately realistic presentations on the commercial stage, Equus was an overwhelming emotional experience. It forced its audience to work. A single block of wood became a psychiatrist's office, a suburban living room, a stable and a restricted cinema. Men in stunning brown track suits with stylized masks and hoofs represented horses. In the film each location and animal is graphically depicted. Visual excitement and imagination has been exchanged for blue skies and cabbage patches.

In the original stage presentation Peter Firth, playing the disturbed youth who puts out the eyes of six horses, gave a haunting performance. When the dark cave of the boy's mind became flooded with self-revelation, and when the austere and terrifying imagery of horse — Christ — sex — pain — flagellation — mutilation was brought to harrowing light and life, it left indelible after-images, half-lit memories out of nightmares. The brutal act stylized on stage awake the sensibilities of the audience. The brutal act when realistically depicted only sent women and men screaming out of the cinema. Sidney Lumet and his editor have succeeded in turning Peter Firth's performance into a nightmare. Blood squirts on Firth's face as he commits the atrocity. Equus, the film, is a horror flick. Nothing less, sadly, nothing more.

The small amount of sympathy given to Shaffer's supporting cardboard characters in the play has been totally eliminated in the film. Peter Mandia, the director of the Theatre Aquarius stage version, has succeeded in enhancing the sympathy. Alan's father stands staring at the mother while explaining to the psychiatrist Dysart that religion is an "insuperable barrier" in their household. In the film the mother prepares tea in another room. The magistrate who brought the distraught Strang to the equally disturbed Dysart establishes a sincere affection for her friend in the Hamilton production by the mere touch of a hand and a tense pause before murmuring "Goodbye." In the film, the magistrate speaks more to her dinner than she does to Dysart.

Perhaps Shelley Winters best described the difference between the stage and film versions of Equus when she said: "Every now and then when you're on the stage, you hear the best sound a player can hear. It's a sound you can't hear in movies or in television. It is the sound of a wonderful deep silence that means you've hit them where they live." When Alan Habberfield at Hamilton Place acted out the blinding of his gods, the six stylized horses, with an invisible hoof-pick there was a gripping silence. His strikes succeeded. When the blood split on Firth's face after he had realistically committed the same atrocity with a sharp scythe in the film there were only horrified gasps. Somewhere, Peter Shaffer and Sidney Lumet missed.

A celebration of comedy

Thomas Dekker (1572-1632) is not a name which leaps to most minds when thinking of Elizabethan playwrights. This state of affairs does not exist through any lack of effort on his part. Over the course of thirty years he wrote or collaborated in writing at least 42 plays, the most popular being The Shoemakers' Holiday (1600) now in production at the St. Lawrence Centre.

Leon Major has assembled an extremely formidable cast for this production including Tony Van Bridge, Frances Hyland, Jennifer Phipps and Patricia Collins. They have, together with the rest of a strong cast, created a highly enjoyable version of a play which runs somewhat long but is always amusing.

The play is alive with boisterousness and mischief, two qualities which Tony Van Bridge as Simon Eyre, Master Shoemaker, plays to the hilt. His timing is superb.

In fact, I found absolutely no fault with the comic technique of any of the major characters. Jennifer Phipps is excellent as Margery, Eyre's overwhelmed wife, and I thoroughly enjoyed the hero-lover of the play, Peter Millard as Rowland Lacy. As in most Elizabethan comedies the plot revolves around love and mistaken identity.

There is not much of depth to analyze in a play of this type, it's really a celebration. In that sense it reminds me of Jonson's Bartholomew Fair. The cast either successfully conveys the spirit of the age and its language or it falls flat. In this production the effort is successful.

Leon Major has kept the pace of the production moving smartly. The only time awkwardness occurred was in the first act where I felt the actors' nervousness about its length led them to strain their comic efforts and the boundry of parody was crossed.

My congratulations are extended to all of those involved in costume and setting, both of which were absolutely first rate. They added much colour and texture to the show.

It is full of vitality and fun and it will certainly be the best production of a Dekker play available in Toronto for a long, long time.

Dream Play: Kermit's relatives upstage their masters

Preconceptions are by nature more easily confirmed than dispelled. Thus it was with no small surprise that I discovered a couple of my firmly held prejudices concerning theatre thoroughly snafued by Tarragon Theatre's current production of August Strindberg's The Dream Play.

The gloom and doom associated with the Swedish playwright's pessimistic exploration into mankind's tawdry existence is here replaced by a temperate poignancy without altering the play's overall meaning. A second and more exciting break with tradition is achieved through the use of three foot high puppets to represent the characters in the play, shaking my belief in the human being as the ultimate instrument of theatrical expression.

While several dramatists have been fascinated by the symbolic possibilities of non-human actors, experimentation with marionettes in the Western theatre has generally been restricted to theoretical probings. Tarragon's production represents a daring adventure into relatively unknown areas. The ability to take risks and to come up with an original concept, while commendable in itself, is not, however, a guarantee of success. A good production requires more than a solitary inspiration. The Dream Play manages to overcome the temptation of exploiting its novel idea, choosing instead to incorporate the puppets, along with verbal and scenic elements into a larger and cohesive unity.
